

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. TITHE RENTCHARGES (IRELAND)—Motion for a Return—

Moved, "That there be laid before the House a Return giving the following information with reference to the terms at present charged by the Treasury for the redemption of tithe rentcharge, vested in the Land Commission in Ireland :—

1. When the tithe rentcharge is capitalised at 22½ years' purchase, what annuity and what term of years would be necessary to repay each £100 of capital if the rate of interest charged were respectively (a) 3 per cent., or (b) 3½ per cent :
2. If the rate of interest were respectively (a) 3 per cent., or (b) 3½ per cent., what capital sum would have been received by the Treasury at the end of 52 years in respect of £100, made repayable by an annuity of £4 9s. 6d. during that term :
3. What rate of interest accrues to, or is obtained by, the Treasury on an annuity of £4 9s. 0d. per cent., payable during 52 years :
4. Why did the Treasury in 1869 recommend the Government of the day to alter the terms from an annuity of £4 10s. 0d. (including interest at 3½ per cent.) for 45 years, to an annuity of £4 9s. 0d. per cent. for 52 years :
5. On what grounds have the Treasury declined to act upon the recommendation of the Irish Land Commissioners that tithe rentcharge vested in the Irish Land Commission should in future be made redeemable at 20 instead of 22½ years' purchase, under the provisions of Section 15 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887,"—(The Earl of Belmore.)

New Clause—

(Payment of duties in advance.)

- "(1) It shall be lawful for the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, upon the request of any person desiring to provide against any duties which may become payable under this Act in respect of property passing on his death, to open an account with such person (to be called an 'Estate Duty Account') into which such person may from time to time pay sums of not less than fifty pounds at one and the same time, to be dealt with as hereinafter mentioned.
- (2) Any sum paid into the Estate Duty Account of any person shall be invested by the Governor and Company of the said Bank in Consols, and accumulated.
- (3) The Governor and Company of the said Bank shall, upon the death of any person, apply the amount, if any, standing to the credit of the Estate Duty Account of such person, in payment, in the first place, of the duties payable under this Act in respect of such of the property passing on his death as he shall by writing under his hand direct, and shall pay the balance, if any, of the amount standing to the credit of such account to the executor of such person, and Estate Duty shall be levied thereon at the proper graduated rate.
- (4) Estate Duty shall not, save as hereinbefore provided, be paid in respect of the amount standing to the credit of the Estate Duty Account of any person at the time of his death.
- (5) Any person may, with the consent of the Commissioners, but not otherwise, withdraw from the said Bank the amount for the time being standing to the credit of his Estate Duty Account.
- (6) The provisions of this section shall not apply to any sum paid into the Estate Duty of any person within twelve months of his death or the investments thereof,"—(Mr. Butcher.)

IN THE

THIRD SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FIFTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND APPOINTED TO MEET 12 MARCH 1894, IN THE FIFTY-SEVENTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

FIFTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1894.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

MCKENZIE FISHERY PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.—(No. 109.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, before the Second Reading was taken, begged to put a few questions to the noble Lord in charge of the Bill. In the first place, he had never heard of a fishery being established in this particular manner before. Apart from that point, the Order by Clause 4 established a separate fishery for the Municipality of Cockenzie, but did not state for what purpose. Then it was not stated whether, when the mussel fisheries were established, power was given to sell the mussels; and, further, the fund out of which the cost of establishment was to be defrayed was not designated. He did not know whether any local tax would be proposed for that purpose. Perhaps the noble Lord was in a position to inform the House.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Lord TWEEDMOUTH): The noble Earl is aware that there are several important beds near Cockenzie; that they have not in the past been properly managed, and that they are very valuable to the local fishermen. The Municipality of Cockenzie is very anxious to secure the enjoyment of those beds to the fishermen, and the object of this Provisional Order is to give to the Burgh Commissioners power to work and manage the beds for the benefit of the locality. I think the noble Earl will see there is no hardship on the ratepayers of the burgh and the neighbourhood if some charge is thrown on them to maintain these beds in a proper condition. The whole object of this Order is to give the Local Body power to manage these beds for the benefit of the local fishermen, and I think, therefore, the noble Earl will not be inclined to raise any objection to its passing.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that was hardly an answer to his question. What he wanted to know was out of what funds these fisheries were to be established? Were they to be carried on at the cost of the ratepayers? No doubt the fishermen would have no objection to the charges being defrayed out of the rates, but were the taxpayers not to be considered? If not out of the rates, out of what fund was the cost to be paid?

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: If the fishery were not to pay its way, I suppose the cost would fairly fall on the rates. But the noble Earl knows something of the condition of the fisheries round the coasts of Scotland, and he will know, therefore, that these mussel-beds are rather a source of revenue than of expense. From my own knowledge of this particular mussel-bed, instead of it being likely to be a charge upon the ratepayers of Cockenzie, it will probably be a source of revenue to them, and be a benefit besides to the local fishermen.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: But still the noble Lord has not answered my question. Will the charge, if there is any, fall on the local rates?

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: I think the noble Earl would do well to save questions of that kind until details are discussed at the proper time and place—namely, the Committee stage of the Bill.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT (1887) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 66.)

THE EARL OF DENBIGH, in moving that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, said he had, in doing so, no idea of dropping or shelving it, which was sometimes understood to be the result of a reference to a Select Committee. He believed a very strong feeling existed in the country upon this subject, and that the public and traders alike required protection from fraud. The Bill was supported by many thousands of all classes throughout the country and by a large body among the Trades Unions. All that was desired was to ascertain the facts of the case, and whether frauds were in fact practised to the large extent alleged, to the detriment of British industry.

Moved, "That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee."—(The Earl of Denbigh.)

Motion agreed to; Bill referred to a Select Committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 22nd June 1894.

QUESTIONS.

THE AMERICAN MAILS.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, in regard to the recent Return giving the time occupied in the transit of the mails from Queenstown and from Southampton to the New York Post Office, whether he can state the average time taken by the mails from the London Post Office, the Liverpool Post Office, and the Glasgow Post Office till put on board a steamer at Queenstown or Southampton respectively; and what proportion of the bulk of the mails in question come through London, through Liverpool, and through Glasgow?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL
(Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.):

From the time at which letters for the United States leave the Post Offices mentioned to the time of embarkation on board the quick Atlantic steamers, the intervals are approximately as follows:—

		Hours	Minutes.
London to	Queenstown	16	0
	Southampton	2	45
Liverpool to	Queenstown	13	10
	Southampton	12	40
Glasgow to	Queenstown	18	20
	Southampton	15	7

I am unable to state the proportions of the correspondence passing through the three places named.

PREPARATION OF VOTERS' LISTS.

MR. LOGAN (Leicester, Harbough): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he is aware that, notwithstanding the Circular on the subject issued by his Department, considerable doubt exists in the minds of many Clerks to County Councils, Overseers, and other officials responsible for the preparation of lists of voters, as to whether they have authority to construct a new list, and the incidental forms rendered necessary by the passing of "The Local Government Act, 1894," and the new franchise created under that Act; and if he will, either by an Order in Council or other means, make the matter clear to all concerned?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): I am not aware that considerable doubt exists on the part of Clerks to County Councils and others with regard to the preparation of the lists of voters; but if my hon. Friend will inform me of the facts as regards any particular case which has suggested this inquiry, I shall be happy to consider them.

FORESTRY.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take any, and if so what, steps to carry out the recommendations of the Committee of this House on Forestry, which sat in 1886?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Suffron Walden): As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, the statutory powers of the Board of Agriculture, which was established subsequently to the sitting of the Committee of 1886, comprise certain important functions in regard to forestry, and we cannot now contemplate the creation of a separate Board of Forestry as proposed by the Committee. With regard to the recommendations of the Committee on the subject of education in forestry, we have continued to make a substantial grant towards the cost of lectures in the University of Edinburgh and towards the cost of the Chair established in the Durham College of Science to include the teaching of forestry, and the arrangements made in 1892 for giving instruction to practical foresters and gardeners in connection with the Royal Botanic Gardens at Edinburgh were again made last year. We also continue to issue special statistical information as to woods and plantations in the annual Agricultural Returns. I think we are doing all that is possible for the promotion of forestry within the limits of our means and powers; but I shall always be very glad to consider any suggestions for further action on our part, and I trust that the Act passed under our auspices last year for facilitating the planting of woods or trees in Scotland may be of some service in this connection.

EMOLUMENTS OF LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Treasury have recently framed a new Minute relating to the salaries and emoluments of the Law Officers of the Crown; and, if so, when it will be presented to Parliament?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I hope to be able to lay the Minute before Parliament early next week.

RAILWAY COMMUNICATION IN IRELAND.

MR. TULLY (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware of the great inconvenience to residents in the districts in the Counties of Leitrim, Longford, Roscommon, and Sligo, adjoining the Midland Great Western Railway, owing to the fact that, by the order of the Board of Trade a few years ago, passenger carriages could not be run in conjunction with the goods trains that leave Sligo for Dublin every night at 9 p.m., and Longford for Sligo at 11 p.m.; whether permission to run mixed trains has been granted by the Board of Trade to the Sligo, Leitrim, and Northern Counties Railway between Sligo and Enniskillen, and is refused to the Midland Great Western Railway between Sligo and Longford, though the traffic in each case is nearly similar; and whether, as this permission has been granted on the Northern Counties line between Coleraine and Derry, and on the Derry Central Branch, and in other parts of Ireland, he will be prepared to recommend that it be granted in the case of the Midland Great Western line between Longford and Sligo?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The Board of Trade gave the Midland Great Western Railway Company permission to run certain mixed trains as long ago as March, 1893, and the Company, in writing, expressed themselves to be satisfied with the arrangements. Among the mixed trains sanctioned is one leaving Sligo for Longford and Mullingar at 9 p.m., and another leaving Mullingar for Longford and Sligo at 9.40 p.m. These are the trains referred to by the hon. Member. If they are not run as mixed trains it is apparently because the Company do not choose to work them as such, although they have the permission of the Board of Trade.

IMPORTATION OF CANADIAN CATTLE.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Mr. D. M'Eachran, whose name appears as Chief Veterinary Inspector to the Canadian Government in the Papers relating to Canadian cattle imported into Great Britain, and published by the Board of Agriculture last year, in connection with the pleuro-pneumonia inquiry, is the same Mr. D. M'Eachran who has for many years been the managing director of the Walrond Ranch in Alberta, Canada; and whether he is the same person as the Mr. D. M'Eachran who is so directly interested in the trade of importing Canadian cattle into Great Britain?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BEXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The Canadian Government has reported that Mr. M'Eachran, the Chief Veterinary Adviser of the Dominion Government, is managing director of the Walrond Rancho, Alberta, but they add that rancho cattle have been increased in value by the Order requiring the slaughter of Canadian cattle at the port of disembarkation; and that the proprietors of the Walrond Rancho sell their cattle on the ground, and are not exporters.

PRISON-MADE GOODS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has been in communication with the Treasury as to the importation of prison-made goods, and with what result; if he has read the affidavit submitted to him of the Commissioner despatched to German prisons by The Hardwareman, or personally conferred with him; if the inquiries promised in Germany are yet complete, and what is their tenour; and if, having regard to the tale of depression recorded by the current issue of The Labour Gazette, the Government will now assent to the Second Reading of the Bill introduced to restrain this traffic?

MR. BRYCE: No, Sir; I have not been in communication with the Treasury as to the importation of prison-made goods, nor am I at present aware of any reason for such communication. I have seen the affidavit referred to by my hon. Friend. The inquiries, which are being conducted through the Foreign Office, are still far from complete. Until they have been completed it would be premature to make any statement upon the subject with which the Bill referred to in the question proposes to deal.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: Has the right hon. Gentleman made any inquiry at the Customs?

MR. BRYCE: I am not aware of any reason why we should inquire at the Customs. Neither the Customs nor the Board of Trade know what goods are prison-made.

THE CASE OF MR. W. E. WARREN.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, N.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that Mr. W. E. Warren, late of Iping Paper Mills, Sussex, was adjudicated a bankrupt on the 27th of August, 1891, he being at the time detained under certificates as a person of unsound mind; if an alleged lunatic is liable to be adjudicated a bankrupt and his estate administered without anyone being appointed to protect his interests, and without any communication being made to the Judge in Lunacy or the Lunacy Commissioners; and if the jurisdiction of the Judge in Lunacy, under Part IV. of "The Lunacy Act, 1890," relating to the management and administration of the affairs of persons lawfully detained as lunatics, is ousted or superseded by the bankruptcy of such persons?

MR. BRYCE: Mr. W. E. Warren was adjudicated a bankrupt on the 27th of August, 1891, in consequence of a resolution of creditors to that effect passed on the 26th of August. It is believed that he was at the time under detention as a person of unsound mind. The remaining questions asked by the hon. Member relate to abstract points of law on which it would not be proper for me to express an opinion. If any opinion is to be expressed it had better be by the Attorney General. In this case, however, the bankrupt applied to the Court to annul the adjudication on the ground of the alleged irregularity of the proceedings, and the County Court Judge, in a carefully considered Judgment, in which all the facts were set out, refused the application, stating in his opinion the bankruptcy was regular. I am, however, not satisfied that the law or the practice which has grown up under it may not require amendment, and am considering whether any and, if so, what measures can be taken for the better protection of persons detained as of unsound mind against whom bankruptcy proceedings have been taken at the instance of a creditor or creditors.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he is aware that the Guardians of Sheffield are stated to be at their wits' end to know how to find work for the unemployed at the present time ; and having regard to the existence of a similar state of affairs in other large towns, what steps are contemplated by the Government to terminate a state of affairs which, if existing in midsummer, is likely to become worse as winter approaches and the population increases ?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : I have not received any communication from the Guardians of the Sheffield Union on the subject of distress in that Union prior to the hon. Member giving notice of his question ; but in reply to the inquiries which I have addressed to them, they state that there can be no doubt that employment is very scarce and general distress prevalent, and that the workhouse is very full for the time of year, but that at present the Guardians have no acute difficulty in dealing with the pauperism of the Union. I regret to learn that there is a scarcity of employment in this Union. But I find that the number of persons in receipt of relief, excluding lunatics and vagrants, is less by about 500 than at the beginning of the present year, and less by over 3,000 than on the 1st of January, 1886. I have no information which would lead me to think that there is any exceptional pressure of pauperism at the present time in other large towns in the country.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : Can the right hon. Gentleman make any suggestion as to how work might be found for the unemployed ?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : That opens a very wide question, which I cannot deal with now.

THE CASE OF NURSE GILLESPIE.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the statement of Mr. Justice Day at the Essex Assize, in sentencing Nurse Gillespie for torturing little children, in which he expressed a hope that the Government will institute a thorough and searching inquiry, because the person primarily guilty is not the only person who should be made to suffer, but that there must be some who, by censure or removal from office, should be stigmatised as having tolerated this hideous cruelty ; and whether he proposes taking any action with reference to the Guardians or proceedings against the superintendent ; if so, what ?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : I had, prior to the conviction of the Nurse Gillespie, determined that a thorough investigation should be instituted into the management of the school, and, pending this inquiry, the superintendent has been suspended from the performance of his duties. I cannot express any opinion as to the extent to which responsibility may attach to others until after this inquiry has been held.

MAJOR RASCH asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the expenses of the committee of the Guardians who were supposed to inspect this institution fortnightly were paid by the ratepayers ?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he was not aware of the fact.

DISTRICT COUNCILS ELECTIONS.

MR. W. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it is the intention of the Board to place the conduct of the first elections of Urban District Councils in the hands of the clerks of Boards of Guardians ; whether he is aware that a statement to this effect has caused much dissatisfaction among the Local Boards of Health, who desire to nominate the person who is to conduct such elections ; and that in some Poor Law Unions there are several Local Boards, so that the clerk to the Guardians if made Returning Officer would be responsible in some cases for a considerable number of elections on the same day ; and whether, under the circumstances, he can see his way to comply with the desires of Local Boards of Health ?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : I can only again state that the question as to the appointment of Returning Officers in the elections referred to will be fully considered before the preparation of the Rules as to these elections is proceeded with. I have not made any statement as to the persons who, under those Rules, will act as the Returning Officers.

TREATMENT OF RABIES.

MR. W. M'LAREN : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that a girl named Jane Watkinson, not being a pauper, was sent by the Chairman of the Ormskirk Board of Guardians to M. Pasteur, in Paris, to be treated, she having been bitten by a dog, and that the cost of the journey of the girl and attendants amounted to £29; whether the Local Government Board have sanctioned the payment of that sum out of the rates; if so, on what ground this unusual form of out-relief was administered to a non-pauper person; and whether this case is to be regarded as a precedent for imitation elsewhere?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: The girl referred to, who was 14 years of age, was bitten by a dog suffering from rabies, and two medical men certified that she should be placed under the care of M. Pasteur at Paris, in order that treatment by inoculation might be carried out. The father of the girl is a farm labourer with a wife and family who are stated to be dependent on his limited and often uncertain earnings, and, as the case was one of great urgency, the Inspector of Police communicated with the Chairman of the Board of Guardians, and with his concurrence the necessary funds were advanced for sending the girl to Paris. When the facts were reported to the Guardians they passed a resolution by 17 votes to 2 confirming the action of the Chairman. The Local Government Board, having regard to all the circumstances and to the fact that the expense had already been incurred, considered that the case was one in which they might properly accede to the proposal of the Guardians, and they accordingly sanctioned the payment by them of such reasonable expenses as might have been incurred.

MR. W. M'LAREN asked whether it was to be understood that this was to be taken as a precedent to enable Boards of Guardians to send persons to Paris for treatment, and whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the father of the girl, although a labourer, was in no sense a pauper, and had not made any application for parish aid?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I think that each case must be considered on its merits.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could state what was the result of the treatment of M. Pasteur in this case?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: No, Sir; I have not heard.

DISORDER IN LURGAN.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now give any further particulars as to the disposition of the police in Lurgan on the 10th instant, when the Rev. William M'Cartan, on his way home through the town, was beaten and wounded in one of the streets; and if he will state what has been done to bring the assailants to justice.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I have this morning received from the Divisional Commissioner a very full police report regarding the disposition and employment of the police on the occasion referred to. The matter obviously requires careful consideration, and probably it may be necessary to call for some further information. Until I have had an opportunity, therefore, of examining the matter in all its bearings it will not be possible for me to give my hon. Friend the information for which he asks in the first part of the question. As regards, however, the second inquiry, I may state that some 18 persons have been identified as having taken part in the attack on the reverend gentleman, and that proceedings will be instituted against these persons. In addition to this, proceedings have been already taken against other offenders in connection with the occurrences on the date mentioned, and at Petty Sessions on the 9th and 11th instant seven persons were made amenable and dealt with—five of them receiving seven days' imprisonment each for stone-throwing and riotous conduct, one a month for assaulting the police, and another was fined £1 for stone-throwing. In all 25 persons are so far being made amenable.

ALLEGED ATTACK UPON AN IRISH MAGISTRATE.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the attack made upon Mr. M'Nally, J.P., of Lurgan, when driving with two young children to his farm in Derryinver, by a drumming party, led by a soldier in uniform, who rushed at the horse and stopped him while the drumming party kept beating their drums and caused the horse to rear and plunge, and did their best to put the horse and vehicle containing Mr. M'Nally and his children into an open drain at the side of the road, and also threw stones at the vehicle, wounding the driver in the head; whether he is aware that Mr. M'Nally reported the outrage to several constables whom he met on the road, but that District Inspector Gray, six or seven weeks after the occurrence, intimated to Mr. M'Nally that the constabulary declined to take up the case; and whether, considering the unprovoked attack made upon this Magistrate, and the early information given to the police, he will make inquiry as to what steps were taken by them against the offenders?

MR. J. MORLEY: The occurrence to which this question refers took place on March 26 last. It appears that Mr. M'Nally with his two children and a man named M'Mahon were driving along a road in the locality mentioned when they met an Orange drumming party. Most of the members of the band ceased playing when approaching the horse, but some of the drummers continued to beat their drums. Two of the crowd, however, took it by the head and led it through. Some stones were thrown after the trap and one struck M'Mahon, though he was not, I understand, injured. Mr. M'Nally reported the occurrence to the police some distance from the scene. The matter was closely investigated, but no overt act could be proved against any particular individual, and the Divisional Commissioner was of opinion that there was not the slightest chance of a successful prosecution. The Attorney General also advised that there was no evidence to sustain a prosecution, and Mr. M'Nally was informed to this effect.

WHISKY PERMITS.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in the case of the recent offences against the Excise Law perpetrated by Messrs. Duuville and Co., Belfast, the whisky was represented to the firm's customers (in the permits and on the casks) as older than it really was; whether this is an offence under the ordinary Criminal Law and under the Merchandise Marks Acts, as well as under the Excise Acts; and whether, in the case of future frauds on their customers by distillers, which would be punishable under the ordinary Criminal Law, he will direct the Inland Revenue authorities not to exercise their power of privately compounding the offences for a fine?

SIR W. HARCOURT: In only two cases was another year substituted for that obliterated. Moreover, as I have before said, the figure on the permits and casks does not purport to represent the age of the whisky, but only the date of the blending (or racking). The offence of which the Inland Revenue took cognisance was a penal offence against the Excise Laws. The mere substitution of one date for another on the permits or casks would not be a criminal offence, and the Inland Revenue have no knowledge, nor means of knowledge, whether there are any circumstances beyond their cognisance which, taken in connection with such substitution, might constitute the offence a criminal one. I do not think there was any offence under the Merchandise Marks Acts. I cannot, in these circumstances, direct the Board not to exercise the discretion vested in them by Statute.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the fact that in August, 1892, a hogshead of whisky was sold by the firm of William Cowan and Company, Church Lane, Belfast, to John Boston, Ballymacarrett, Belfast, which did not correspond with the particulars stated on the permit accompanying the whisky; that the permit had been altered by the sellers after it had passed the Excise officials; that a summons was taken out in Belfast Police Court against the sellers, and adjourned; and that, during the adjournment, the offence was compounded for by the payment of a fine to the Excise; and, if so, what was the reason for adopting this course, and what was the amount of the fine?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Except that the permit was granted by the Customs and not by the Excise, the facts are as stated. Proceedings were commenced by the Board of Inland Revenue against the then proprietor of the business for the Excise offence of tampering with a permit. Those proceedings were withdrawn upon payment of a compromise fine of £300. The Board exercised the discretionary power conferred on them by Statute, of compromising offences against the Excise Laws, on two grounds—namely, that the circumstances disclosed no fraud on the Revenue; and that they were satisfied that the then proprietor had no cognizance of the matter.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Upon whom was the fraud perpetrated; was it not on the person who bought the whisky?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I really cannot say. I cannot be expected to answer a question of that kind without notice.

COMMANDEERING IN THE TRANSVAAL.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is correct, as stated in telegrams from South Africa, that British subjects in the Transvaal were forcibly commandeered on Wednesday and sent in prison wagons to fight in the Boer Army; and, if so, what action Her Majesty's Government proposed to take to put an end to such outrage?

MR. S. BUXTON: We sent a telegram to-day on the subject, but have as yet received no reply.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Is it not the fact that German, French, and Portuguese subjects in the Transvaal are free from this liability?

MR. S. BUXTON: It is true they are free, and, as I have formerly stated, the Colonial Office has made representations to the High Commissioner of the South African Republic on the matter.

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether we are not the Suzerain of the Transvaal, and, if so, whether in that position we have no power of controlling their proceedings over British subjects?

[No answer was given.]

MR. DARLING (Deptford): Can the question be answered whether Her Majesty is still Suzerain of the Transvaal, or not? Perhaps the hon. and learned Solicitor General can tell us.

[No answer was given.]

SIR D. MACFARLANE: I beg to give notice that I shall put a question upon this matter on Monday.

MR. BARTLEY: May I point out that we have not yet had an answer to the question of my hon. and learned Friend behind me?

[No reply was made.]

THE DEATH DUTIES.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight): I beg to ask, in reference to the question of Death Duties on colonial property, whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have any objection to lay on the Table the joint letter dated June 12, addressed to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, by the Representatives in London of all the self-governing Colonies except Natal?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes, I will lay it on the Table.

BRITISH GOODS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will name a day for the consideration of the action of the Secretary of State for the Colonies in rejecting the offer of the Premier and Government of Cape Colony and the British South Africa Company to admit British goods into Matabeleland and Mashonaland on more favourable terms than foreign goods?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am unable to name a day for the purpose. But the hon. Gentleman must not assume that I admit the accuracy of the statement of fact in the question.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: When will the Colonial Vote be taken?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am afraid I cannot say.

PAYMENT OF PROBATE REGISTRARS IN IRELAND.

MR. BARRY (Wexford, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the average number of probate and administrations extracted per annum in Ireland is, and what proportion of them would be included in the provisions of Clause 13 of the Finance Bill, taking any recent year as an example?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The average number of probates and administrations extracted in Ireland during the three years ending March 31, 1893, was 7,108. Taking the year ending March 31, 1893, as an example, the total number of grants extracted was 7,574.

Those under the value of £1,000 numbered 6,566, of which 5,938 were also under the value of £500. It is impossible to say what proportion of the grants extracted in Ireland will be included in the provisions of Clause 13 of the Finance Bill, in view of the fact that, under the Bill, the real estate will for the first time fall to be aggregated with the personality.

MR. BARRY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many of the District Registrars of the Court of Probate in Ireland are at present paid by fees; what their average income from fees is; and whether any estimate has been made as to how their position will be affected if Clause 13 of the Finance Bill passes into law in its present form?

SIR W. HARCOURT said, five District Registrars of the Court of Probate in Ireland were paid by fees, and the average net income from fees in the three years ending 1892-93 was £2,020 amongst the five.

FORAGE ALLOWANCE TO VOLUNTEERS.

COLONEL BRIDGEMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will consider the advisability of issuing forage or giving the forage allowance to mounted officers of Volunteer corps when in brigade camps?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): I am afraid I cannot accept the suggestion in the hon. and gallant Member's question. In the first place, capitation grants are for corps and not for individuals; and, in the second, the camp allowance to Volunteers is intended to cover all the expenses incurred by them in going into camp, so far as recent offences appear as a public charge perpetrated by Messrs. L tion on the sites selected by the Director General or the War Office of buildings recently wrecked by explosion; and, if so, whether such representations were opposed to the reconstruction on those sites or any of them?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Representations were made by Colonel M'Clintock of the kind referred to in the question. Those representations were contrary to the opinion he had previously concurred in, and were opposed to the recommendations made by the Director General of Ordnance Factories, upon whom rests the responsibility for the processes of manufacture, and whose views are supported by the technical experts of the highest authority, upon whose advice we are acting in this matter.

MR. HANBURY: I suppose this opinion was given before his dismissal?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes.

STRENGTH OF CAVALRY REGIMENTS.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state the number of men and horses composing an English cavalry regiment on a peace footing; how many additional men and horses would be required to place the same regiment on a war footing; whether cavalry reservists received any training in their mounted duties; and whether there is any reason to suppose that, in the event of sudden mobilisation, the requisite number of trained men and trained horses would be forthcoming for the purpose of placing the cavalry regiments on a war footing without any dangerous delay?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: A cavalry regiment on a peace footing at home varies in strength from 428 men with 280 horses in the seven regiments last for foreign service to 656 men with 410 horses in the six regiments which are first to go abroad. On a war footing, a cavalry regiment would consist for home service of 581 men and 511 horses, or for foreign service of 634 men with 530 horses. There is an ample number of trained men in the Reserve. They have not been trained in their mounted duties while in the Reserve; but they have all served in cavalry regiments, and it was found at the last mobilisation that, after a very short time, such men were quite competent to take the field. As regards horses, cavalry regiments do not require as many horses as men. Their horses, so far as required, would be drawn from those registered for Army service. These are civilian horses and have not had Army training; but in every case of mobilisation, where there is a large increase of horses, many animals without military training must of necessity be employed.

THE DONEGAL ARTILLERY.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that Colonel Stewart, commanding the Donegal Artillery, has repeatedly reported certain members of the permanent staff of his regiment for inefficiency and misconduct, and that no notice has been taken of his Reports, and that in January last, when he reported two sergeants of the permanent staff, his immediate superior officer, Colonel Perry, commanding at Londonderry, in forwarding Colonel Stewart's Report, stated that he considered the tone of Colonel Stewart's remarks in his letter of the 31st of January, 1894, most improper and unfair, as it showed a very decided personal animus towards the members of the permanent staff, and that Colonel Stewart forthwith applied for an investigation of this grave charge; and will he explain why Colonel Stewart's Reports have been disregarded, and the investigation which he demanded not granted?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): Colonel Stewart's Reports have not been disregarded; but, the subject of them having been inquired into by the General Commanding his district and by the Field Marshal Commanding in Ireland, those officers have not thought it necessary to grant the investigation demanded; and I do not propose to interfere with their decision.

THE UNDERGROUND RAILWAY.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to certain articles and correspondence in The Pall Mall Gazette as to the state of the atmosphere in the Underground Railway, and the means of purifying it; and whether he will take steps to deal with the matter effectually?

MR. BRYCE: I have myself had such frequent and painful experience of the state of the atmosphere in certain parts of the Underground Railway that no newspaper articles could make me feel more strongly than I do the inconvenience from which the public now suffers. But Parliament has not intrusted the Board of Trade with any powers which would enable them to deal effectually with the mischief of which my hon. Friend complains.

MR. WEIR asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the Report which was furnished to him by the Metropolitan Railway Company a few days ago was of an extremely weak and unsatisfactory character—so much so, that he should be compelled to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the matter again?

MR. BRYCE said, that that did not affect the answer he had given—namely, that the Board of Trade did not possess the power to interfere effectually in the matter.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Are there no means of dealing with a Railway Company who violate the law in this way?

MR. BRYCE: I have already told the House that the Board of Trade has no power to deal with the matter.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolution [21st June] reported ;

"That it is expedient that the value for the purpose of Succession Duty of a succession to real property arising on the death of a deceased person shall, where the successor is competent to dispose of the property, be the principal value of the property, and that provision shall be made for the payment of such duty with interest from the expiration of twelve months after the date of the death on which the succession arose, and the provision of the existing Law with respect to discount shall not apply."

Resolution agreed to.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Finance Bill that they have power to make provision therein pursuant to the said Resolution.

FINANCE BILL.—(No. 190.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 21st June.]

[SEVENTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 14.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) moved an Amendment to reduce the rate of duty on estates between £500 and £1,000 value from £2 to 30s., the Amendment being the first of a series designed, he said, to ease off the heavy jumps which occurred, particularly at the bottom of the scale. A person whose life was insured for £500 was a comparatively poor person, and if a sum exceeding £500 were to pay so heavy a tax as £10 instead of 50s., life insurance would be discouraged and persons would be tempted to insure for lower amounts in order to avoid the heavy Estate Duty. The people who could leave a provision of no more than from £500 to £1,000 were the class who deserved consideration, certainly as compared with those who left from £1,000 to £10,000; and he therefore moved that the duty should be reduced from £2 to 30s. per cent.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 25, to leave out the words "two pounds," and insert the words "thirty shillings." —(Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'two pounds' stand part of the Clause."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) said, it might be inferred from the hon. Member's speech that the Government were raising the duties, whereas they were reducing them on £1,000, and still more on £500. He should be glad if the Exchequer could dispense with any tax at all under £1,000, but it could not afford to do so. He had very carefully considered whether he could go further than he had done. He believed that people who could leave only £500 or under were the people who most deserved consideration, and that was the reason why only 1 per cent. was charged under £500 and 2 per cent. between £500 and £1,000—in both cases a very sensible reduction.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, it must be remembered that the scale was effectively made much higher by bringing a much larger amount of property under duty; realty and settled personalty were both brought within the scope of Estate Duty.

SIR W. HARCOURT : There is not much aggregation under £1,000.

MR. HANBURY hoped there would be in future, because the tendency of legislation was to split up realty. This high duty would hit poor people and would discourage small holdings in land. These now escaped duty under probate, and for the first time would be taxed for Estate Duty.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) felt obliged to take the Chancellor of the Exchequer under his protection as to this Amendment, which, in the interests of the Exchequer, was not one he could accept; but he would point out that there was already in the Bill a remarkable reduction on £1,000 to a stranger, who now paid £125, and under the Bill would pay £20, thus escaping £105 of taxes, while an English widow taking the same amount in foreign property would pay £20 more than at present.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 169 ; Noes 104.—(Division List, No. 120.)

MR. BARTLEY said, his further Amendments were on the same lines. If the Government would not give way it was no use to waste time.

On Motion of Sir W. HARCOURT, the following Amendment was agreed to :—Page 10, line 37, leave out from "per cent." to end of line 38.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he would move, after the word "over" in the Amendment, to insert the words "ten pounds or."

Amendment proposed, after the word "over," to insert the words "ten pounds or."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he preferred the words as they stood.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Then, in the interest of accuracy, I shall divide upon it.

SIR R. WEBSTER : It seems to me that these words are necessary.

SIR W. HARCOURT : Rather than have a Division I will agree to the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Surrey, N.W.) said, he desired to move to add to the clause the following :—

"Where by reason of another death a second Estate Duty shall become payable upon the same property within four years, it shall be levied and paid in respect of such property at one-half of the rate payable upon the principal value of the estate in which it is included."

It had been estimated that every estate on an average should fall in for Estate Duty once in 30 years. But there might be many cases in which the succession might be much quicker, and in which the burden of the duty would be so heavy as to materially diminish, if not destroy, the property altogether. A personal friend of his who took an interest in this subject had informed him a few days ago that in his own family not far back three successions had taken place within a space of 14 months. Though such a thing did not often occur, at any rate it was a matter which they should provide for. Take the case of quick succession between brothers or husband and wife, or persons of the same age—or a case where in an accident husband and wife or brothers perished practically at the same time, though, in the eyes of the law, with an interval sufficient to give succession, should full Estate Duty be paid a second time? It was with a view of meeting cases of this kind, which he considered were cases of real hardship—though they would not often occur—that he had put down his Amendment. He would ask the Committee to bear in mind that the Amendment did not touch the principle of aggregation or graduation, and did not in any shape favour real property. He was quite certain that if the Amendment were not accepted in the cases he referred to, the duty would be paid with a sense of injustice, and hardship, and robbery.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 38, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—

"Where by reason of another death a second Estate Duty shall become payable upon the same property within four years, it shall be levied and paid in respect of such property at one-half of the rate payable upon the principal value of the estate in which it is included."—(Mr. Heywood Johnstone.)

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he quite understood the feelings which had inspired this Amendment. He quite agreed that in some cases where the successions followed rapidly the imposition of the Estate Duty would constitute a considerable hardship. They must all know of such cases. The difficulty he had in providing against this was that so far he had been unable to get at what would be a fair average period to allow for successions taking place, and he considered that the fault of the Amendment was that it did not deal in a practical way with the case. It seemed to him that it

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) said, it might be inferred from the hon. He should be glad if the Exchequer could dispense with any tax at all under £1,000, but it could not afford to do so. He had very carefully considered whether he could go further than he had done. He believed that people who could leave only £500 or under were the people who most deserved consideration, and that was the reason why only 1 per cent. was charged under £500 and 2 per cent. between £500 and £1,000—in both cases a very sensible reduction.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, it must be remembered that the scale was effectively made much higher by bringing a much larger amount of property under duty; realty and settled personalty were both brought within the scope of Estate Duty.

SIR W. HARCOURT: There is not much aggregation under £1,000.

MR. HANBURY hoped there would be in future, because the tendency of legislation was to split up realty. This high duty would hit poor people and would discourage small holdings in land. These now escaped duty under probate, and for the first time would be taxed for Estate Duty.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) felt obliged to take the Chancellor of the Exchequer under his protection as to this Amendment, which, in the interests of the Exchequer, was not one he could accept; but he would point out that there was already in the Bill a remarkable reduction on £1,000 to a stranger, who now paid £125, and under the Bill would pay £20, thus escaping £105 of taxes, while an English widow taking the same amount in foreign property would pay £20 more than at present.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 169 ; Noes 104.—(Division List, No. 120.)

MR. BARTLEY said, his further Amendments were on the same lines. If the Government would not give way it was no use to waste time.

On Motion of Sir W. HARCOURT, the following Amendment was agreed to :—Page 10, line 37, leave out from “per cent.” to end of line 38.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he would move, after the word “over” in the Amendment, to insert the words “ten pounds or.”

Amendment proposed, after the word “over,” to insert the words “ten pounds or.”—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he preferred the words as they stood.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Then, in the interest of accuracy, I shall divide upon it.

SIR R. WEBSTER : It seems to me that these words are necessary.

SIR W. HARCOURT : Rather than have a Division I will agree to the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, N.W.) said, he desired to move to add to the clause the following :—

“Where by reason of another death a second Estate Duty shall become payable upon the same property within four years, it shall be levied and paid in respect of such property at one-half of the rate payable upon the principal value of the estate in which it is included.”

It had been estimated that every estate on an average should fall in for Estate Duty once in 30 years. But there might be many cases in which the succession might be much quicker, and in which the burden of the duty would be so heavy as to materially diminish, if not destroy, the property altogether. A personal friend of his who took an interest in this subject had informed him a few days ago that in his own family not far back three successions had taken place within a space of 14 months. Though such a thing did not often occur, at any rate it was a matter which they should provide for. Take the case of quick succession between brothers or husband and wife, or persons of the same age—or a case where in an accident husband and wife or brothers perished practically at the same time, though, in the eyes of the law, with an interval sufficient to give succession, should full Estate Duty be paid a second time? It was with a view of meeting cases of this kind, which he considered were cases of real hardship—though they would not often occur—that he had put down his Amendment. He would ask the Committee to bear in mind that the Amendment did not touch the principle of aggregation or graduation, and did not in any shape favour real property. He was quite certain that if the Amendment were not accepted in the cases he referred to, the duty would be paid with a sense of injustice, and hardship, and robbery.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 38, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—

“Where by reason of another death a second Estate Duty shall become payable upon the same property within four years, it shall be levied and paid in respect of such property at one-half of the rate payable upon the principal value of the estate in which it is included.”—(Mr. Heywood Johnstone.)

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he quite understood the feelings which had inspired this Amendment. He quite agreed that in some cases where the successions followed rapidly the imposition of the Estate Duty would constitute a considerable hardship. They must all know of such cases. The difficulty he had in providing against this was that so far he had been unable to get at what would be a fair average period to allow for successions taking place, and he considered that the fault of the Amendment was that it did not deal in a practical way with the case. It seemed to him that it proposed simply to deprive the Revenue of all that it wished the estate to gain, while at the same time it offered the Revenue no corresponding advantage to make up for what it was to lose. They might have intervals of 60 or 70 years between successions. The Revenue was obliged, like the individual, to take the rough with the smooth. Probably somewhere about 30 years would be a fair average to reckon that successions would occur, but at the same time there were many cases on record where an estate had not changed hands for nearly twice that period. The Revenue in that case could not provide beforehand that an extra rate of duty should be paid, and therefore they should not be asked to accept less in those cases than the present Amendment wished to shield. While he was fully aware that there was much to be said in favour of the point raised by his hon. Friend, he regretted that he could not see his way to accept his Amendment because it would not, in his opinion, really meet the case.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said, the right hon. Gentleman admitted the hardship which in certain cases must arise, but he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he would not deal with it because of the difficulty which would occur in the case of good lives. He (Mr. Chaplin) admitted that, so far as good lives were concerned, they could not deal with the case because this was a measure providing for Death Duties, and even the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not propose bringing lives to a termination before their natural end. Nevertheless, the hardship complained of was so apparent that he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see his way either to accept the Amendment or, at any rate, to provide some remedy to prevent the injustice that he admitted might in certain cases be done by the imposition of the tax. If the principle of the Amendment was sound—and, for his part, he thought it was—the proposal did not go quite far enough. He thought that the period of 30 years was not sufficiently long for an average. On the other hand, cases had been known where there had been three or even four successions to the same property within the period of half-a-dozen years. Suppose the property were worth £1,000,000, the rate of duty that would have to be paid would in some cases be as high as 18 per cent. So that, assuming there were three successions in six years, if the 18 per cent. were multiplied three times, nearly half the property would have been in that short time paid away.

SIR W. HARCOURT: They would be three strangers.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he did not care who they were. A tax that in six years could swallow up half a man's property was surely nothing more or less than confiscation. No doubt the case he had taken was an extreme one, but it only showed that a great hardship might arise, and therefore it was clearly the duty of the Committee to provide against it. He believed that the Committee were most willing to prevent the possibility of such an injustice, and it would be prevented if the right hon. Gentleman would sanction the proposal. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to meet their wishes and would agree to allow a more liberal reduction even than that asked for by the hon. Member who had moved the Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he would remind the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who imputed to him (Sir W. Harcourt) the desire to take three 18 per cents. from an estate that under the present law three 14 per cents. were taken, that this was in the case of succession by strangers. He should have no objection himself to inherit property on the terms provided in the Bill. He considered that a man who was fortunate enough to inherit a million of money from a stranger should not mind having to pay the Exchequer handsomely for the right to enjoy it.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would make a concession in this case. No doubt a fair average period of succession was the idea they would like to arrive at. There was no justice in the argument put forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that because the estate of the man who lived for many years paid too little, therefore they had a right to make the estate of the man who enjoyed the property only a few years pay too much. The effect of making these heavy charges on estates in cases where there was rapid succession would be to deprive the owners of estates of the power of doing their duty by their property. If three members of a family—one succeeding the other—perished in a railway or other accident, and the previous holder had died a short time before, they would have in the course of a few months or, it might be weeks, an enormous burden thrown on the property. The result would most likely be that for many years after the accident there would be a non-resident owner of the property, and all the evils that they knew to flow from absenteeism would ensue.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Does it not occur now?

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE said, that in connection with the Death Duties it would always be the case to some extent; but the complaint was that, owing to the enormous extent to which the duties were increased by the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it would be more difficult for owners who lived on their property to do their duty by their cottagers and tenants. The idea that it was a good system for owners to live upon their property was an idea with which the right hon. Gentleman himself would agree. It was only in extreme cases that the duty would be diminished under the Amendment. The answer to the Amendment seemed to be that justice must be done to the Exchequer. Well, what they wanted was that justice should be done to the individual and to the property, and that the Exchequer should stand in the second or third place.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY said, he should like to point out how hardly the tax which would be imposed by the Bill might fall upon a family three or four brothers of which might happen to be serving Her Majesty in a campaign at the same time. He knew a case in which two or three brothers had served in the Crimea at the same time. It was possible that all those lives might have been lost within a short period of each other, and the result might have been disastrous to the family property. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was no doubt bound, in defiance of his natural feelings as custodian of the Public Purse, to stand by his original proposition. If the Exchequer would lose rather than gain by the proposed alteration, the fact would weigh with the right hon. Gentleman, but it could not be too distinctly impressed on the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite, who did not understand these things themselves, that the direct result of this rapid transference of estates from one owner to another, coupled with piling up of burdens on property, was disastrous not only to the individuals who succeeded, but also to all the people connected with the property, and to all the residents and all the rural life of the district. If they were able to strike a balance between the national loss and national advantage regarding this subject, they would find that the national loss would be greater than the advantage from the heaping up of burdens on estates and that national benefit would be derived from the acceptance of a moderate proposal such as that now before the Committee. If in this matter they could find a crevice in the right hon. Gentleman's armour through which they could reach his sense and justice, and could induce him to make this concession, it would tend to the advancement of the right hon. Gentleman's own reputation both as a financier and as a sympathiser with national needs.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, the Amendment dealt with the case in which the Estate Duty became payable for the second time on the same property within four years. If the average succession was at the end of 30 years, it was clear that when it occurred at the end of four years the Revenue got a windfall. All that the supporters of the Amendment asked was that the wind which brought the Chancellor of the Exchequer that windfall should be tempered to the shorn lamb who succeeded to the property. His hon. Friend was so moderate that he only proposed that the second Estate Duty should be levied at half the rate of the first. The Chancellor of the Exchequer met that by pleading for justice to the Revenue, but the right hon. Gentleman had a majority at his back and acted as judge in his own cause. The right hon. Gentleman was sure to have justice, but those he (Mr. Lawson) represented had only one vote for one constituency—or would only have one vote when certain reforms were carried out. Instances had been quoted in which, unless this section were amended in the manner proposed, or some such manner, the Estate Duty would swallow up the whole income of an estate. The noble Viscount had pointed out that in certain cases where three persons succeeded each other in rapid succession the Exchequer would get half the estate, but there would be cases in which the Exchequer would take the whole of the estate, at any rate, for eight years. For instance, he was told of a case the other day, within the personal knowledge of an hon. Member, in which in connection with a small property of £10,000 there were three successions in eight years. The father died and left the property to his illegitimate son. The son died and left it to his cousin in blood, who was, of course, a stranger in law. The second successor had to pay £365 a year out of a net income of £300. That was what was called in Roman law a damnosa hereditas. It was recognised that landed property only paid 3 per cent., which was putting it rather high.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then you take the value of land at 33 years' purchase.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, that more than 3 per cent. could not be got from landed property. He was making a liberal estimate when he mentioned 3 per cent. If three instalments of duty were running together there would be little or nothing left for the proprietor to live upon. Amongst lineals it was not easy to find cases where 3 per cent. would swallow up the whole property—except where a million of money was left. Between £100,000 and £150,000 the increment would be one-eighth of 6 per cent., and if three duties were running at a time the proprietor would have three-fourths per cent. left to live on. When you get amongst brothers you soon get a case in which the whole interest on the property is swallowed up by three sets of instalments running together. Between £1,000 and £10,000 the instalment would be one-eighth of 6 per cent., and if three of these were running together the proprietor would have three-fourths per cent. left to live on. Between £10,000 and £25,000 the instalments would be one-eighth of 7 per cent., or seven-eighths on the value of the property; and if three were running together it would mean twenty-one-eighths, which would leave three-eighths to the proprietor to live on. From £50,000 to £75,000 the instalments would be one-eighth of 8 per cent., or 1 per cent., and three instalments running together would absorb 3 per cent., or the whole value of the estate. He might add as following favourite propositions in Euclid "Q.E.D."

SIR W. HARCOURT was much obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman for favouring him from time to time with arithmetical acrostics, but he would point out that in the case to which the hon. Gentleman referred it appeared to be assumed that all the instalments were always running together, but that could only be the case if all three persons died at the same instant of time—a thing which could never be considered as likely to happen. In the case of two persons dying at sea the presumption of Roman law was that the eldest would live the longest.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, the right hon. Gentleman had referred to his acrostic, but had not attempted to give them the least solution of it. He had put the case if the three instalments overlapped. While the overlapping went on the proprietor of the estate would be practically dispossessed. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to endeavour to avoid possible injustice.

*MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not answered the case mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition a few nights ago, which was an absolute case. At this moment there were four instalments running upon that estate, which was of some £10,000 value. The succession devolved upon one of three old ladies in 1890. In April, 1893, that old lady died, who left it to another who died in August, 1893, and left it to a third who died on the 11th of April of the present year. If the charge upon each death were £75 the amount payable would be £300 on the whole income of the estate. Hon. Members would ask why the owners did not sell the property? As a matter of fact, they were willing to sell it for half its value, but could not get a bid for it. They were, therefore, bound to keep the property, and pay the rates, whilst under the present Bill they would be forced to pay the whole of the income of the property—namely, £300, to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman must see that the facts of this kind were sufficient to make out a prima facie case for considering the Amendment. If the clause remained in its present form the result would be to substitute a gambling for a business transaction as far as the Exchequer was concerned, inasmuch as it was probable that what would be lost upon one estate would be gained upon another. It was obvious that people who saw that the whole of their income would go to the Exchequer would make provision to prevent this happening, and there would be unlimited evasion of the Bill. He would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, before the Report stage, he could not consider what would be the financial effect of the adoption of the Amendment? Surely it would be within the right hon. Gentleman's power, even if he did not accept the limit of four years, to agree to a limit which would not rob the Exchequer, but which would prevent the occurrences of the extremely hard cases that were likely to occur if the clause were passed in its present form.

MR. THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk) said, he had heard of a case in which three old ladies, sisters, aged respectively 81, 83, and 90, died in one week. Under this clause such a case would be a very hard one, and he thought provision ought to be made to meet it.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) said, this was really a very important question, and he should like to add his appeal to those which had been made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Several cases of very great hardship had been mentioned. The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not deny the hardship, but admitted it, and his only answer was to point out hardships which existed under the present law. No doubt hardships did exist under the present law; but when a Chancellor of the Exchequer took in hand the reform of the whole system of Death Duties, surely his object should be to remove hardships. Instead of removing hardships the right hon. Gentleman was increasing them. The right hon. Gentleman said that if an attempt were made to remove a particular class of hardship the result would be that the State would lose. He (Mr. Balfour) must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that there were occasions on which it was better that the State should lose than that individuals should lose. It was better that the estate should lose than that property should pay the Estate

Duty three or four times over within a very short period. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that, on the whole, he was doing rough justice. This reminded him of the story of a certain cynical Judge, who was reported to have said that rough justice was done by the Courts because, although it was perfectly true that a certain number of guilty persons were found not guilty a certain number of innocent people were convicted.

SIR W. HARCOURT: My hon. Friend says that we ought to consider this question from the point of view of the advantage of individuals rather than from that of the advantage of the State. But he must observe that in the case of rapid successions by death there are several individuals who profit, whereas if there is a long interval between successions there is only one who profits during that period. Those who succeed rapidly get more than they have a right to expect. They are made happy under circumstances which they had no right to look forward to. I think, therefore, my hon. Friend should accept the arrangement as one of the greatest happiness to the greatest number.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said, the reply to the extraordinary argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that if a couple of deaths occurred within a very short period the successor who survived for only a short time could not be said to rejoice to any extent. In the case of real estate it would be the estate itself which would suffer.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): No, no.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said, he was perfectly aware that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Brunner) always pooh-poohed that argument, but he did not think that the hon. Gentleman could have had much experience of real estate. He imagined that the greater part of the hon. Gentleman's property was in personality. Those who were acquainted with estates in the country knew how great an evil it was if such an estate was so burdened that the proprietor was not able to do justice to it.

MR. WINGFIELD-DIGBY (Dorset, N.) said, there were gentlemen on the Government side of the House who talked sometimes about real property, and one hon. Gentleman said the other night that he would support every line of the Bill because he did not happen to own a single acre. When statements of this kind were put forward he (Mr. Wingfield-Digby) thought that some words ought to be spoken to show the hardship that would fall upon others besides the actual successors to property unless some Amendment of this kind were adopted. All the agricultural labourers who were employed on the property and all the farmers who were connected with it would necessarily suffer. The tradesmen in small towns, the village carpenter and the small builder who got work to do in connection with improvements and repairs on the estate would also suffer.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, that the cases dealt with in this Amendment would frequently occur, and in such cases an injurious effect would be produced upon the property. As the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Wingfield-Digby) had pointed out, it was necessary to consider the interests of the locality. If there were two successors within a year who had to pay 7 per cent., a total of 14 per cent., the Estate Duty, with the Legacy Duty, would bring the payment up to, say 20 per cent. This payment by the Bill was spread over eight years, and would absorb the whole income. The practical result would be that during those years the State would be the beneficial owner and would obtain all the beneficial interest. He asked, was the State prepared to perform the duties of the landlord? Of course, hon. Members knew it was not. That being so, it was clear that unless some such Amendment as this were adopted great disadvantage would result to all the persons living on this property, and it was in their interest that he pressed the Chancellor of the Exchequer to grant some alleviation in such cases.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am ever ready to meet arguments brought forward with reference to this taxation, as it directly affects individuals, but I must also say a word upon its indirect action, because not only in this House but out of it I hear an argument which I cannot give any assent to—namely, that particular classes of the community are to be exempted from taxation in a manner in which other classes are not exempted, in order that they may be generous and munificent. That is a view to which I will never assent. I am glad that people should be munificent and generous; that they should keep great houses and should open them to their neighbours; but I am not willing that such munificence and generosity should be founded upon the fact that the money used for the purpose is an exemption from taxation to which other people are liable.

*SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): That argument has never been used outside this House nor in it. It has not been demanded that people should be exempt from taxation because they are munificent or generous. The demand put forward has been that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should consider the effect of the new taxation he seeks to impose. The custom of this country has been that persons who possess landed property do not spend all the proceeds of it upon themselves. They spend a portion upon the community around them. They spend a proportion of the money they receive in the employment of labour and the employment of tradesmen, and in a manner which does not affect the person who spends it so much as it does those who receive it. I know one estate with which I have had to deal officially where there is, of course, a non-resident owner—the Duchy of Cornwall. Even there, there are charges on that estate which have become as certain charges as if they were the indebtedness caused by mortgages—the endowing and repairing of churches and schools, and the maintenance of persons in the locality. The charges for these and other purposes have now become fixed charges on that estate, and they make a very substantial difference between the gross and the net income. Those who say that these are expenses incurred through generosity only must recollect that if you take away the means of meeting such expenditure you injure not so much the person who makes the payment as the person who receives it. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer says, "I am careless whether these payments are made or not, and I am going to cripple the person who has made them," he will injure not the person he is aiming at, but the person who has hitherto benefited by these payments. That is the argument which has been used in this House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has misrepresented that argument, but he has never answered it. I think he ought to answer it. If he prevents these benefits being continued from what source are they to come? If they are discontinued will he tell the Committee who will suffer: will it be the person who does not continue them, or the persons who do not receive them? The Chancellor of the Exchequer twice in my hearing has said this is an attempt of a class to obtain exemption from taxation.

Mr. Wingfield-Digby

AN hon. MEMBER: So it is.

SIR H. JAMES: Let those who say "so it is," in a way that conveys no argument, meet us in fair argument. If by this taxation you take away the means of those who have spent money for the benefit of a community, where is the vast expenditure to come from? If they gave us some information upon that point, they would support the Chancellor of the Exchequer much better than by saying "so it is," which conveys no argument whatever. I would appeal to him to be good enough to say how the case that has been put to him is to be met?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think I can answer my right hon. Friend by this illustration: A man keeps a certain number of horses; he employs a certain number of servants, a certain number of gardeners, and so forth; you might enable him to keep more servants and more horses, and more gardeners, if you relieved him from all taxation, and you say, by any taxation you put upon him, make it more difficult for him to keep so many horses, and so many servants, and so many gardeners. But if it does not apply to the Estate Duty only, why do you not relieve him from the Income Tax, or when you are increasing the duty say it shall not be increased upon them, because if you do they may keep half-a-dozen less horses, half a dozen less grooms, gardeners, and so forth. It is because of this very argument—that would go to the extent of relieving this particular class, because they employ, it is said, on their estates a certain number of people, and therefore should be furnished with the means of doing so by an exceptional proposal of taxation—that we cannot accept that principle.

SIR H. JAMES: That is not the principle we have asked my right hon. Friend to accept; he has not met the point at all; I am not asking for exemption where money is being spent on the employment of horses or servants, or anything in the nature of personal luxury, but where money is spent upon subjects which are fixed charges of occupation. Take the case of open pleasure grounds—and I know of one that is visited by half a million of people free of charge during every year, but which grounds will have to be closed if this taxation is imposed. All this is a benefit to the public, and it is no answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say you have so many servants, so many grooms, or so many horses. I said nothing about them, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has entirely changed the issue by putting forward a case that is not suggested; he has not answered the case that has been put to him, and he seems to think when arguments are used outside this House it is fair to those who use them to change them to a new form of issue. I say that no answer has been given.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham) said, it was most extraordinary to him that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and some, if not all, of his supporters continually met their assertion by saying that they on their side of the House had asked for exemption from taxation. They were doing nothing of the kind, but in this instance they asked that where a particular tax under certain circumstances inflicted hardship and injustice that it might be modified. He trusted that even yet the Government might accept this reasonable Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Sussex (Mr. Heywood Johnstone). If they were to go to a Division let there be no mistake as to what the issue was. If the right hon. Gentleman wished to inflict an additional blow upon an industry that was already very heavily burdened let him say so boldly. The effect of accepting this Amendment upon the Revenue would be very small, as it could not arise in a great number of cases; but it would not be small in the particular cases put forward by his hon. Friend, because it would not only affect the case of the estate, but all those who were dependent upon the estate, therefore to them it was a very great question, whilst to the Revenue it was very small. What they had to decide was whether they were going, with their eyes open, to vote for a thing that must be the means of inflicting great hardships upon many persons?

*MR. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham) said, the case alluded to by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was very different to what the Chancellor of the Exchequer represented, and if the Committee would allow him he would tell them an instance which he knew to be a fact, an instance which was occurring at the present moment. It was the case of a property the owners of which let the house and the shooting, consequently there was no question of keeping servants, grooms, gardeners, and so forth; but yet it cost the owners £1,500 a year in wages to agricultural labourers, estate carpenters, and others who dwelt in the village connected with the estate. During the last five years, whilst the expenses had been £1,500 a year, the net income was only £150 a year. The owners had determined to go on with this expense for the sake of those dependent on the estate for employment, but if the Government were going to inflict these duties upon them it would be absolutely impossible for their successors to continue this expenditure of £1,500 a year.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The argument used by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) amounts to this: that if you pay a certain proportion of income for laudable purposes it is not fair to tax the capital on which that income arises, and he introduced the element of charities, saying that sums of money are given—and I admit most wisely and properly given—for the support of churches and educational purposes, and that that was expenditure that entitled the money to be exempted from taxation. But is liberality confined to the owners of land? Are there not large sums of money given by those whose property consists entirely of personalty? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury has entirely changed the issue. The case shown is one of hardship with reference to duties recurring too frequently, whereas the argument of the right hon. Member for Bury is an argument against taxing large properties altogether, but the Committee has decided that, and it cannot be reopened. A case was put by the hon. Member for Peebles (Mr. Thorburn), which, he said, had recently arisen, the case of three ladies dying within a week where the property was taxed three times. Suppose that property, instead of being land, was Consols—£10,000 of Consols—there is no addition to the duty payable under the present Bill, but the existing law would require on the second and third death the same duty to be paid as on one; the Probate Duty would be paid, and if it was not a case of transmitting property from father to child, Legacy Duty would have to be paid in addition; therefore there is no new principle introduced into the law as to personal property. Take real property. Suppose the interest was one of a tenant for life, if he died pending the payment of the duty with no instalment paid, the estate would not be called on to pay the unpaid instalments; but supposing he was absolutely entitled, or was a tenant for life with a power of appointment on his own death, that privilege would not apply, and he would, or his estate after him would, be liable to pay the whole unpaid instalments. But the Government have met that very liberally. On large landed estates they provide that only one duty shall be paid under one settlement, no matter how many lives take an interest in that settlement.

MR. BRODRICK: I gave an unsettled case.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I know; but the great bulk of landed estates in this country are settled, and where these rapid transmissions take place from brother to brother—for, after all, that is the real case that is put, suppose that one brother dies in the service of the Queen, in warfare, and he is succeeded by another brother—no further money is paid; 1 per cent. covers all the transmission from one to the other. Why should a person absolutely entitled to landed property be put in a different position, with reference to the payment of the duty, to persons absolutely entitled to personal property?

MR. BRODRICK: In the case I mentioned he neither receives income nor can he dispose of the principal.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Does the hon. Member think there is no other property on which there is no income? During the last few years there has been an enormous amount of personal property in this country that has not brought in any income. Does he suppose there is not a very large amount invested in trade that brings in a very small income? The argument of the hon. Gentleman opposite is that if you compel an owner to close his place or cease keeping up his estate you are putting a large number of persons out of employment. So you are where the cotton millowner is obliged to close his mills. I do not know what hon. Members behind me will say as to the cotton trade, but in the iron trade the profits have not been of late years 3 per cent. upon the capital employed in it. In assessing taxes you cannot go into the question of what is the productive character of that in which this capital is invested. You take it on the value of the invested capital at the time, whether it is cotton mills, ironworks, Consols, or landed estates, and I am sure the Amendment to the clause introduced into the Bill by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition has very fully guarded the community against any excessive taxation with regard to property under special depreciation arising from the causes to which hon. Members have alluded. There is no desire to inflict any injustice upon any class at all, though one would suppose, according to hon. Members, that the Government have some vindictive purpose in introducing this measure, and desire to make the tax as onerous as possible. The Chancellor of the Exchequer laid down that the principle of wise taxation is to collect the tax with as little friction as possible, and he has shown, by the large number of Amendments he has accepted, his readiness to meet the views of hon. Members on that point. The hon. Member opposite put a possible case. I will not say such a case has not happened, but he puts a case and asks the Government to introduce a principle that would strike at the root not only of this Bill, but of the Probate Duty. I know where settled estates have not been disturbed for 60 years, and where, under the proposal of the Government, no additional duty would be payable. The same applies to large owners of personal property—if they have a long life you might say the State loses; if they have a short life the State gains, and yet I am sure the hon. Member would be astonished if the Government proposed that every estate should pay at a certain fixed period. That is not the principle on which we have gone, and, without going into the general question which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) raised—

*SIR H. JAMES: No, no; the Chancellor of the Exchequer raised it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: My right hon. Friend is incorrect; the question was raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London, and I was replying to him.

*SIR H. JAMES: The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "I am replying to speeches made out of this House and in," and I was replying to those observations.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: By whom?

SIR H. JAMES: You know.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Now let me recall the Committee to the Amendment before it, which is whether there is to be exceptional legislation in the case of estates which, from exceptional causes, change hands at a more rapid rate than in the normal state of affairs. Unless you are prepared to take both sides of the question and deal with estates which do not change hands so rapidly, it is impossible to accept the principle of this Amendment.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: I wish just to say a word by way of explanation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer followed me in Debate, but he has not answered me. I said nothing whatever about munificence; I was talking about the repairs to farm-buildings and expenses of that kind, and my argument was that for several years the State would be the real owner, but would do nothing to keep up the property.

*MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) did not think that anyone on that side of the House would find fault with the rebuke administered to his colleague by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India. At the time the right hon. Gentleman rose he (Mr. Cohen) was trying to catch the Chairman's eye, in order to do what the right hon. Gentleman did—namely, to bring the Chancellor of the Exchequer back again to the Amendment they had been discussing up to that time. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would be the last to say that after he had, no doubt unintentionally, altogether misrepresented the argument, which he did not condescend to answer, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) was wrong in endeavouring to reply to the remarks which the Chancellor of the Exchequer so irrelevantly introduced. The Committee would see, as the Secretary of State for India pointed out, the question before them at this moment was the question to which the Secretary of State for India, in the latter part of his speech, addressed himself, whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer should give exceptional treatment to estates under exceptional circumstances, and he did not think it was a good argument to adduce that no case was made out for exceptional treatment because under a different condition of affairs this exceptional treatment was not necessary. It was because the duty was now proposed to be seriously increased, to an extent which under certain circumstances became absolutely oppressive, that they thought a case had been made out, not in the interests of any particular class, but in the interests of the Exchequer and the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself. He would not cite cases of a million, as he thought the case was strengthened by referring to those that arose week by week and day by day, and if brothers succeeded to an estate of £40,000 or £50,000, surely not a very large amount, within a short interval they were eating up those estates and destroying them within a period of 20 or 30 years. And what did the Exchequer do? They were not spending their money on reproductive work, in maintaining and increasing the value of their estate, but as it passed from successor to successor they ate it up and destroyed it until in time there was absolutely no backbone and no reserve in this country. It was in the interest of the Exchequer of this country that the strength of the country, which consisted in its wealth, should be preserved, and the Amendment had been proposed in that view and, he thought, ought to be accepted.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I wish to say one word about this very important case. The Government, through the mouth of the Secretary of State for India, stated the special provisions of this Bill, against which this Amendment is directed, are not intended for the defence of any class. I accept that, and it is not in defence of a class that I wish to offer a defence of this Amendment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer tells us this scheme works out "fairly, upon the average"; but what does his "fairly, upon the average" mean? It means, in the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he will not get out of the property on the whole more than he ought to get out of it, but by the particular method in which this taxation is levied it will be inequitable. There will be a large number of individuals at one end of the scale who will be clearly ill-used, and at the other end of the scale there are others who will not pay what they ought to pay. By what canon of justice do you get rid of an inequality by simply throwing an unfair share of burden upon the owners of those estates on which there happens to be a larger number of deaths in a comparatively small space of time? That is the broad issue, and I do not wish to dwell upon it, as it has been before the Committee at sufficient length. But there is one thing that has not been put before the Committee to which I wish to call attention. The Secretary of State for India pointed out truthfully that one method was provided under this Bill by which the grosser forms of this inequality could be avoided by the owners of property, and that was the method of putting your estates into settlement. If you do that, no doubt, however many deaths occur, no special taxation is thrown on the capital value of the property; but is it part of the deliberate policy of the Government to compel everyone to put their property in settlement? I have always understood that while settlement was a procedure tolerated by the various Governments of this country, it was not one generally approved by any, and not at all by hon. Gentlemen opposite. I thought it was one of the canons of their policy that settlement should be discouraged; but if you are going to provide settlement as the only way in which gross injustice to individuals is to be avoided, then everyone who anticipates such a disaster will, of course, feel driven to settle their property, however they would be glad to leave it in some other way. This is an argument it is worth while the Committee bearing in mind, and it affords me an additional reason for supporting the Amendment.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE said, it was not until the concluding sentence of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India that he had any idea the right hon. Gentleman had ever read the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Amendment asked the Committee to introduce a new principle into the taxation suggested by this measure. There he thought the right hon. Gentleman had fallen into exactly the same error which, with all due respect to him, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had fallen into in imagining that the certain injury to the individual was to be in any degree outweighed by loss of profit to the State. Was it a loss of profit, after all? because, on the hypothesis of the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, it should be regarded rather as a windfall. The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not lose a certain amount of money which would otherwise come to him, but he was put into the fortunate position of receiving, within a rapid interval, what might be spread over a considerable number of years. He asked hon. Members to read this Amendment before they voted upon it and to remember that it did not interfere with graduation and with aggregation, and it raised no difference whatever between the treatment of real property and personal property. It did not attempt, in any way whatever, to favour realty at the expense of personalty, and he asked the Committee to adopt the Amendment.

MR. BRODRICK said, that as so many references had been made to the small amount which the Exchequer would lose under this proposal he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he had made any estimate as to such loss?

SIR W. HARCOURT was understood to reply in the negative.

COLONEL KENYON - SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, there seemed to be a general consensus of opinion that if the system of Death Duties as proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to take effect and this Amendment were not accepted, the result must be the withdrawal of a large sum of money now annually spent, and upon which the agricultural community of the country depended. If that were so, what was the use of hon. Gentlemen opposite going about the country and professing to say they wanted to keep the agricultural labourer upon the land, when the result of this clause must be to withdraw the expenditure on which the agricultural labourer depended? The Government by their action would be withdrawing the inducement for, or the possibility of, the agricultural labourers remaining in the country; therefore let it be clear that when hon. Gentlemen opposite acknowledged they withdrew the money on which the labourers lived, the effect of that withdrawal must be to drive the agricultural labourers from the villages into the towns. The Government were taking up this line upon this Amendment, and he dared them to go to the country afterwards. [Ministerial cheers.] He wished they were as ready to take up his challenge as they were to cheer. After taking up this attitude he would challenge the Government to go to the country and tell the agricultural labourers they were advocating their cause and were desirous of keeping them in their homes, when, as a matter of fact, they were adopting legislation which would have the effect of driving them out of their homes.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 38, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—

“Where by reason of another death a second Estate Duty shall become payable upon the same property within four years, it shall be levied and paid in respect of such property at one-half of the rate payable upon the principal value of the estate in which it is included.”—(Mr. Heywood-Johnstone.)

Question put, “That those words be there added.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 160; Noes 199.—(Division List, No. 121.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.”

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that this clause raised for the first time to any extent the suggestion of progressive, graduated taxation. He would not stop to inquire whether they had been right or wrong in the principles which in this country they had hitherto held—the principles of encouraging individual exertion and protecting the individual in the enjoyment of the fruits that he had won by his labour. The graduation of taxation took an entirely different view of the matter. The view now put before them was, that in the case of a man who exercised frugality, thrift, and diligence, and who by those qualities won a great prize, the State was to step in and take a large share of it away. The greater the frugality, thrift, and diligence, and the greater the prize won, the larger was the amount taken away from him as a penalty for having been so successful and industrious. It had been said of the rich man, of the successful man, "he heapeth up riches and cannot tell who shall gather them," but he could tell now. It was the Chancellor of the Exchequer who would gather them. He should like to know what kind of encouragement this new principle in its application would be to the industrious man starting in life conscious of ability and capable of making great exertions? Would it not be a discouragement to him to know that if he succeeded greatly he would be despoiled greatly? If he acquired a large fortune, instead of leaving it to his children, a much larger portion of it would by this progressive or graduated principle be taken from his children than if he had been less successful in the race of life. If it be the real object, as it was with some, to reduce them all to one level, he thought the principle of graduation should be applied a little earlier—namely, to the earnings of a man rather than to the property he left. They should have an all round 8s. per day, for Solicitor Generals and all—even Chancellors of the Exchequer. That was the true application of the principle; but when they left a man free to earn any wage by any means, then, having left him free all his life, to come in at the end of life and say they were going to take away the prize was a kind of public policy calculated to stunt the growth of this country and to degrade the individual in it to something much lower than anything he had ever been known to be. But if they were going to apply this progressive principle, at any rate let them apply it rationally. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for India had said they should apply it in such a way as to produce equality of sacrifice and to equalise taxation. Yet how did they apply it in the clause as it stood? Under this clause, the millionaire who inherited £1,000 from a butler paid £20, but the butler who inherited £1,000 from a millionaire paid £80. That sounded like a comic invention, but it was in the Bill. If they were going to apply graduation that was not the way to apply it. But graduation in any shape inflicted a very grave disability and serious difficulty upon the tax-collector, and he, for one, had never been able to shake himself free from those principles of tax collection he imbibed during the five or six years he spent in the Legacy Office. The difficulty in connection with graduation was that if they levied a greatly increased tax upon the larger estates they would render the sum payable for duty so large that every kind of ingenuity would be exercised in order to prevent the State from getting it. There were two ways by which the State might be prevented getting the tax—one was evasion and the other avoidance.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that the principle of graduation of the Estate Duty is not open to discussion. The only question open is the scale. You must take the clause as it is.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I presume I am not out of Order in discussing graduation.

THE CHAIRMAN: It would be out of Order to discuss anything else but the scale.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that inasmuch as the scale was founded on graduation, he understood he might refer to it, though not at great length. He had been curious to know where this progressive graduation principle was borrowed from. He at first thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had invented it; but when he came to reflect on the usual genesis of things, he came to the conclusion that he should find it in the French Revolution. There accordingly, having searched, he did find the original inventor of progressive taxation, and the name of that original inventor was Tom Paine—English outlaw, French law-maker, member of the French Convention, atheist, and revolutionary. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was a degenerate descendant of the great atheist, for he had not applied the principle properly, and Tom Paine was much cleverer than the right hon. Gentleman. In his Rights of Man, written in 1792, Paine said this—

* Admitting that any annual sum, say, for instance, one thousand pounds, is necessary or sufficient for the support of a family, consequently the second thousand is of the nature of a luxury, the third still more so, and by proceeding on, we shall at last arrive at a sum that may not improperly be called a prohibitable luxury. It would not be politic to set bounds to property acquired by industry, and therefore it is right to place the prohibition beyond the probable acquisition to which industry can extend; but there ought to be a limit to property or the accumulation of it by bequest. It should pass in some other line. The richest in every nation have poor relations, and those often very near in consanguinity. The following table of progressive taxation is constructed on the above principles, and as a substitute for the commutation tax. It will reach the point of prohibition by a regular operation and thereby supersede the aristocratical law of primogeniture."

That was exactly the same object as the Chancellor of the Exchequer's, but the way in which Tom Paine's scale was carried out was a scientific way. It proceeded thus: On the first £1,000, 1 per cent.; on the second £1,000, 2 per cent., and not when there were £2,000 to put the whole extra charge on the whole £2,000, but only on the second thousand, whereas the Chancellor of the Exchequer put the extra charge on the whole. Under Paine's system the charge at this rate on the £2,000 would be 30 per cent., whereas under the Chancellor of the Exchequer's system it would be 40 per cent. On the other hand, as they rose higher on, the scale increased, and Tom Paine's scale would catch up to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's, and the larger properties would give him a higher duty than he even now asked for. He therefore sincerely regretted that among all the studies of Adam Smith and other great men the right hon. Gentleman had kept aloof from the sympathetic pages of Tom Paine, and that, consequently, instead of presenting to them a scientific scale going on a proper curve and acting on a comprehensible principle he had presented to them a scale, which, he ventured to say, was a very bad scale indeed. In Victoria exactly the same mistake had been made, and he quoted Victoria because, like Adam Smith and Tom Paine, Victoria was one of the authorities the Chancellor of the Exchequer believed in. In Victoria, as he had said, exactly the same mistake was made in proposing progressive taxation that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was making at this moment. When first proposed in 1870, the whole range of properties from £1,000 to £100,000 was put into five categories. But it was found that the jumps, not merely in the limits of the property, but also in the rate of tax, were so great that hardship was inflicted in some cases, and the Estate Duty was evaded or avoided in others. The result was, that in 1890 an amending Act was passed in which the five categories of properties were increased to nine, and two years ago a still further amending Act was passed, by which the categories of property which originally stood at five were increased to 37. Consequently, we should be exposed in this country to the same inconvenience to which people of Victoria were exposed before they made the Amendment. Before long the Chancellor of the Exchequer would find it necessary to do what had been done in Victoria—namely, to make the period shorter, and make the steps in the variations of duty shorter, and consequently bring his scale more into accordance with the facts of life. But the scale applied as well to property outside as within the United Kingdom, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had more than once admitted that he could not get the duty upon property outside. Take the case of the hon. Member for the Carnarvon Boroughs, who might be assumed to be a millionaire, and who said he had half his property invested abroad. Upon that £500,000 the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not get the duty. Aggregating that sum with the other £500,000 in this country it would be chargeable with 8 per cent.; but since the duty could only, as was now admitted, be got out of the property here, the property here would therefore be charged at the rate of 16 per cent.; an extra tax upon property in this Kingdom, of a very remarkable kind. Not only that, but by the fact of the aggregation the property pays more than it should. Supposing an individual has £500,000 of property abroad out of a million, it would be liable to 8 per cent., and the £500,000 here would pay therefore £80,000 duty, while a property of an equal amount here—namely, £500,000, if all here would only pay £35,000. This was the result of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's scale, and he would hardly mend it by setting up reciprocity, which apparently meant that duty levied on property in Victoria might be deducted from the amount of duty on that property payable here, if the duty levied on property here were deducted from the amount of duty on that property payable in Victoria. But there was no such duty as that payable in Victoria.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Committee was not now discussing general principles.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he would not, of course, dispute the Chairman's ruling, but he was addressing himself to the proposed scale. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had gone to a considerable length in framing this scale. Two different systems were proposed: one for the Colonies, and the other for foreign countries. But he had always hitherto in Customs Duties repudiated that system of differentiation. It seemed that the system which was renounced at the Custom House was to be set up and worshipped at Somerset House. He could show that this scale of duty when put into operation would yield to the Chancellor of the Exchequer less money than he collected under the present system, quoting from the Returns of 1891-2. No tax varied so much as the Death Duties. That was one of the objections to them. They came in an unequal manner, but, broadly speaking, they came to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. all round. There was a very important matter in regard to the reductions on small estates. Estates under £50,000 formed $99\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. in number, and in value they constituted 60 per cent. of the whole. Under this scale, broadly speaking, there was no increase on properties under £50,000, but, on the contrary, a decrease on the tax levied upon the smaller estates. This Estate Duty, which was going to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer such an enormous result, from £3,500,000 to £4,000,000, must therefore arise from other properties beyond those of smaller value to the extent of 60 per cent.

SIR W. HARCOURT asked from what the hon. Member was quoting?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he was quoting from the statistical abstracts issued by the Board of Trade.

SIR W. HARCOURT pointed out that the hon. Member was dealing with settled property, and, leaving out real estate, was only taking personal property.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he was taking all property, real and personal, which was subject to Death Duties, and for the purposes of the proportion the figures he was giving were sufficient. At all events, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was wrong in fact when he said that real estate was left out. On only 40 per cent. in value would the duty be increased—in some cases considerably, but on the whole to an extent much less than the Chancellor thought, for the reason he would give. It was extremely dangerous greatly to increase the scale only in the case of the large estates, because they would thereby greatly increase the temptation to both evasion and avoidance. So hardly would this scale press upon people that they would try to a much greater extent than at present to avoid the payment of Estate Duty by making gifts to eldest sons and others during their lives. In itself that would no doubt be a good thing, but it would be bad for the Exchequer. Something would be gained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on settlements and something on real estates, but it would be very little, probably not above $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. He would also gain something by charging on the capital value of real estate instead of upon the annual value of life interests. In introducing his Budget the Chancellor of the Exchequer represented that that would be something enormous; but he had since admitted that the whole result upon the equalisation of realty with personalty by charging upon capital value instead of life interests would only bring in £100,000, which was exactly 1-140th of the entire duty he expected to get. He had told the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the beginning that the results of this great alteration would be very small. The only really large increase arose from property out of the United Kingdom, and that being now given up the basis for the anticipated increase from this Finance Bill was gone. In a large number of cases of real estate there would be an absolute diminution of chargeable value. What with giving up property out of the United Kingdom, what with the exemptions of property under the £300 scale, the £500 scale,

Mr. Gibson Bowles

Mr. R. T. REID said, that since the Amendment introduced by the Leader of the Opposition with reference to the mode of valuing agricultural land, it was obvious that the principle ought also to be applied to Clause 15, dealing with Succession Duty, because that duty was to be levied on the principal value, and it would not be fair, under the circumstances, to deal with it in the way provided by Statute. But neither the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman nor the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for York, lower down on the Paper, was near the mark of what he would like. What he would suggest was the insertion of the following words as a new sub-section :—

"The principal value of real property for the purpose of Succession Duty shall be ascertained in the same manner as it would be ascertained under the provisions of this Act for the purpose of Estate Duty."

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) contended that the interpretation of "principal value," if inserted in the manner suggested by the Solicitor General, would apply only to cases where the successor was competent to dispose of the property. How, then, if the successor took only a life interest, would that interest be reckoned? Would it not be according to the mode in which a life interest was at present reckoned under the Succession Duty Act? Therefore, would there not be different modes of reckoning the value of the estate in the case of succession to the full estate and in the case of succession to a life interest? He thought the mode of arriving at the value of the property for the purpose of Succession Duty should be the same in both cases; and he doubted whether that would be provided under the words suggested by the Solicitor General.

Mr. R. T. REID said, it was perfectly true that where a successor was not competent to dispose of the property the mode of valuation under the Succession Duty Act applied. The only case in which there would be a change in the valuation was when the successor was competent to dispose of the property.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he wished to explain what he meant. The point, no doubt, was complicated, but it was a very important point. Under the Succession Duty Act a successor who merely took a life interest would, if the clause passed in its present shape, only pay on the value of his life interest—namely, on a certain number of years calculated on the term of life at which he had arrived. Where the successor took the full estate he would pay the duty on the full estate. But whether he paid on his life interest or on the full value of the estate, surely the mode of calculating what the value of the estate was ought to be precisely the same in both cases. If they allowed the law to stand as it was at the present moment, they would have under the Succession Duty Act a special and most complicated form of arriving at the value of the life interest in the case of realty. For instance, the mode in which timber was valued was extremely complicated; and was by no means, as he was personally aware, either satisfactory to the Inland Revenue authorities or to the person succeeding. Real estate was only liable to pay on the value of the timber on the estate, according as the timber was cut and realised for sale, and the liability might continue through sixty years if the life was as long, so that the owner never escaped from the liability to the duty for the whole of his life. That was a complicated way of levying duty, and the result, he believed, was that a great deal of duty was never paid. Now, what was the proposal which the Government had adopted in order to arrive at the principal value of agricultural property on the Motion of his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition? It was this: that, subject to the governing principle of the market value, the principal value of agricultural property should be based on the assessment of Schedule (A) of the Income Tax Returns. That got rid of all those difficulties and complications that were inherent in the present system of the Succession Duty Act. It would be fair to the taxpayer, and infinitely less troublesome to the Inland Revenue. His point, therefore, was that where payment of Succession Duty was made on the life interest, as it would be in all cases of settled property, and where it was made on the full value of the estate, as it would be in future when the property was not settled, in either case the same rule of valuation should be acted on in calculating the amount of the duty that was to be paid. He was sure that if the Solicitor General considered the matter further and consulted had last spoken to whom his father had already commenced assigning his property. There was one thing which hon. Gentlemen opposite must have heard with satisfaction. The one infallible authority on the subject—the hon. Member for Lynn Regis—had assured the country gentlemen that land would pay less under the Budget than it did now.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : I did not say that ; I said in some instances. The large estates, of course, will pay more.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he understood the statement to be that under this Budget less money would be collected than at present, including the large estates.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he really could not allow himself to be both contradicted and misrepresented. His prediction was that the whole return of Death Duty would be less under this scheme than now, not, in the case of land alone, though many estates would pay much less than at present.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that the country gentlemen were not concerned for the large estates ; it was, of course, merely the small estates that they cared for. The hon. Member said that less money would be paid by the landed interest than formerly, and on that ground he invited the support of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES could not submit to be so misrepresented. He must repeat that, in his belief, the whole returns for the Death Duties would be less than they were now—not the returns from land alone. A good many landed estates would pay less than they do now, but the large estates would, no doubt, pay a great deal more.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) pointed out that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had accepted either of the scales proposed on the previous day, this desirable result would have been achieved—that those who provided for the payment of the Estate Duty by the purchase of an annuity or by saving money would have had that money taxed on the lowest scale. The hon. Member for Bodmin had proposed that annuities should escape aggregation, because he argued, fairly enough, that a man might buy an annuity with the object of creating sufficient funds to pay the tax ; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer had objected that it would be absurd and unreasonable to free that particular form of providing for the tax, and that there would be just as much claim to relief where a man had saved sufficient to pay his Estate Duty. His object in referring to the matter was to point out that where a person had either by purchase of an annuity or by saving money collected enough to pay the Estate Duty, on his death, that sum, although not completely escaping taxation, should be taxed on the lower scale. People should be encouraged to make provision of that kind during their lifetime by allowing the money to pass, if not free of taxation, at all events with as little charge as possible. By that means a feature of justice would be introduced into this Bill, and it was worth the careful consideration of the Committee whether even later on some modification might not be made for that purpose.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the question involved was not the question of graduation, but the method by which that principle was to be applied. The scale proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was open to grave objection on grounds of expediency and justice, and he hoped his hon. Friends would divide, taking the view of the scale proposed by the right hon. Gentleman.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 192 ; Noes 145.—(Division List, No. 122.)

Clause 15.

MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) moved, in page 11, line 5, after the words "principal value," to insert the words "ascertainable in manner before mentioned." The object of the Amendment was to secure that the amount of Succession Duty was arrived at by the same mode of valuation as was provided for Estate Duty by the new clause moved by the Leader of the Opposition last week, and accepted by the Government.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 5, after the words "principal value," to insert the words "ascertainable in manner before mentioned."—(Mr. Brodrick.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. R. T. REID said, that since the Amendment introduced by the Leader of the Opposition with reference to the mode of valuing agricultural land, it was obvious that the principle ought also to be applied to Clause 15, dealing with Succession Duty, because that duty was to be levied on the principal value, and it would not be fair, under the circumstances, to deal with it in the way provided by Statute. But neither the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman nor the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for York, lower down on the Paper, was near the mark of what he would like. What he would suggest was the insertion of the following words as a new sub-section :—

"The principal value of real property for the purpose of Succession Duty shall be ascertained in the same manner as it would be ascertained under the provisions of this Act for the purpose of Estate Duty."

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) contended that the interpretation of "principal value," if inserted in the manner suggested by the Solicitor General, would apply only to cases where the successor was competent to dispose of the property. How, then, if the successor took only a life interest, would that interest be reckoned? Would it not be according to the mode in which a life interest was at present reckoned under the Succession Duty Act? Therefore, would there not be different modes of reckoning the value of the estate in the case of succession to the full estate and in the case of succession to a life interest? He thought the mode of arriving at the value of the property for the purpose of Succession Duty should be the same in both cases; and he doubted whether that would be provided under the words suggested by the Solicitor General.

Mr. R. T. REID said, it was perfectly true that where a successor was not competent to dispose of the property the mode of valuation under the Succession Duty Act applied. The only case in which there would be a change in the valuation was when the successor was competent to dispose of the property.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he wished to explain what he meant. The point, no doubt, was complicated, but it was a very important point. Under the Succession Duty Act a successor who merely took a life interest would, if the clause passed in its present shape, only pay on the value of his life interest—namely, on a certain number of years calculated on the term of life at which he had arrived. Where the successor took the full estate he would pay the duty on the full estate. But whether he paid on his life interest or on the full value of the estate, surely the mode of calculating what the value of the estate was ought to be precisely the same in both cases. If they allowed the law to stand as it was at the present moment, they would have under the Succession Duty Act a special and most complicated form of arriving at the value of the life interest in the case of realty. For instance, the mode in which timber was valued was extremely complicated; and was by no means, as he was personally aware, either satisfactory to the Inland Revenue authorities or to the person succeeding. Real estate was only liable to pay on the value of the timber on the estate, according as the timber was cut and realised for sale, and the liability might continue through sixty years if the life was as long, so that the owner never escaped from the liability to the duty for the whole of his life. That was a complicated way of levying duty, and the result, he believed, was that a great deal of duty was never paid. Now, what was the proposal which the Government had adopted in order to arrive at the principal value of agricultural property on the Motion of his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition? It was this: that, subject to the governing principle of the market value, the principal value of agricultural property should be based on the assessment of Schedule (A) of the Income Tax Returns. That got rid of all those difficulties and complications that were inherent in the present system of the Succession Duty Act. It would be fair to the taxpayer, and infinitely less troublesome to the Inland Revenue. His point, therefore, was that where payment of Succession Duty was made on the life interest, as it would be in all cases of settled property, and where it was made on the full value of the estate, as it would be in future when the property was not settled, in either case the same rule of valuation should be acted on in calculating the amount of the duty that was to be paid. He was sure that if the Solicitor General considered the matter further and consulted with the Inland Revenue authorities, he would find that in that way only could they arrive at a satisfactory solution of the question.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER was understood to say that the Government only intended to apply the change of the valuation to cases in which the successor was entitled to dispose of the property.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, the result of the Amendment of the Leader of the Opposition would be to give, in estimating the principal value for the purpose of Estate Duty, better terms than were now given in the case of estimating the annual value for the purpose of Succession Duty. But the precise reasons that induced the Government to give the better terms in one instance were strong enough to have induced them to give those terms in the other case. That was the point to which he wished to direct the attention of the Government, and nothing that had been said in reply ought to dispose the Government to continue in their unfavourable attitude.

MR. R. T. REID promised to consult with the Inland Revenue authorities on the subject. His belief was that the Amendment he intended to move at the end of the clause would not carry out the effect the right hon. Gentleman desired, but it was better to insert that Amendment.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he desired to point out that the succession created by this clause, under certain circumstances, would be a succession that did not exist under the Succession Duty Act; and therefore there was a strong case for the Amendment.

MR. BRODRICK said, that under the circumstances, he would not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. R. T. REID said, it would be more convenient for him to move his Amendment at the end of the clause.

MR. BRODRICK moved, in page 11, line 5, after the second word "property," to insert the words—

"After deducting the Estate Duty payable thereon and the expenses of raising and paying the same and vesting the property in the succession."

His objects were to secure that the amount for which Succession Duty would be payable, in the case of £100,000 for instance, was £100,000 less the Estate Duty, and that was £94,000; that the expenses of raising and paying the Estate Duty, and the expenses of vesting the property in the succession should be allowed.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 5, after the second word "property," to insert the words—

"After deducting the Estate Duty payable thereon and the expenses of raising and paying the same and vesting the property in the succession."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, there was one part of the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman to which he assented. He agreed that in the case of Succession Duty payable there ought to be a deduction in respect to Estate Duty, because the property to which a man succeeded would be less the Estate Duty. He also agreed to allow the expenses of raising and paying the Estate Duty; but he could not allow the expenses of vesting the property in the succession. That might mean the expenses of a great Chancery suit, for instance. He, therefore, would suggest as an alternative Amendment, to insert after the second word "property," line 5, the words—

"In respect thereof, on the said death, and the expenses, if any, properly incurred in raising and paying the same."

MR. BRODRICK said, he could not gather that there was any strong objection on the part of the Solicitor General to the concluding words of his Amendment. However, he would withdraw his Amendment, and accept the words of the hon. and learned Gentleman, hoping that the hon. and learned Gentleman would consider before the Report stage whether or not it was possible for him to go a step further.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 5, after the second "property," to insert the words—

"In respect thereof, on the said death, and the expenses, if any, properly incurred in raising and paying the same."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to:—

Page 11, line 6, after "payable," insert "by the same instalments as are authorised by this Act for Estate Duty on real property."

MR. BYRNE said, he had been asked by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight to move the following Amendment:—Page 11, line 9, at end, to add the words,

"Where Succession Duty is chargeable on the principal value of real property, the provisions of Section 14 of 'The Succession Duty Act, 1853,' shall apply in the same manner as if that section were herein enacted and extended to a succession to real property as well as to personal property."

The object was simply to put realty in the same position as personalty with regard to the provisions of Section 14 of "The Succession Duty Act of 1853," which provided with regard to personalty that only one duty was payable in the case of two predecessors.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 9, at end, to add the words—

"Where Succession Duty is chargeable on the principal value of real property, the provisions of Section 14 of 'The Succession Duty Act, 1853,' shall apply in the same manner as if that section were herein enacted and extended to a succession to real property as well as to personal property."—(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. R. T. REID said, he had consulted with the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight on this motion, and had suggested to him that the same purpose would be effected by making the end of the clause to run as follows:—

"And shall be payable with interest at the rate of three per cent per annum from the expiration of 12 months after the date on which he becomes entitled to the possession of the succession or is in receipt of the profits thereof."

MR. BYRNE said, that if the hon. and learned Member was sure that his words would extend the benefit of Section 14 of the Succession Duty Act to real estate he would accept them and withdraw his Amendment.

MR. R. T. REID said, the matter was complicated. His object was to prevent escape from the payment of Succession Duty in any case where Succession Duty was payable now.

MR. BUTCHER said, he was not sure that the Amendment of the Solicitor General would effect the object they aimed at.

MR. R. T. REID pointed out that if this Amendment were adopted now the matter could not be properly dealt with afterwards. By the addition of the words—

"On which he became entitled to the possession or was in receipt of the profits thereof," the point raised by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight would be met, unless he had changed his previous opinion.

MR. BYRNE said, he had received no intimation to that effect.

MR. R. T. REID said, that no doubt anything found to be necessary could be inserted afterwards.

MR. BYRNE said, after the Solicitor General's statement the Amendment must, of course, be withdrawn.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES urged that the Amendment should be withdrawn, and the words of the Solicitor General adopted.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to:—After the words "arising on the death," insert—

"On which he became entitled to the succession or was in receipt of the profits thereof."

MR. R. T. REID moved to add the words—

"The principal value of real property for the purpose of Succession Duty shall be ascertained in the same manner as it would be ascertained under this Act for the purpose of Estate Duty."

Question proposed, "That those words be added."

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, the more he looked at these words the more he was convinced that the clause would not carry out the original intentions of the Government. He would not detain the Committee by repeating what he had already said on the subject if the right hon. Gentleman understood the point he desired to raise.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the legal authorities whom he had consulted were satisfied that the words would carry out the intention of the clause—namely, that on agricultural property the valuation should be made on the saleable value.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH admitted that that would be the result where the successor was competent to dispose of the property; but it would not be so in the case of a life interest. The words proposed by the learned Solicitor General would not carry that intention into effect where only a life interest accrued. He felt quite certain that the right hon. Gentleman would admit that to be so on a careful re-perusal of the clause. The intention was that the value of the property should be ascertained in the same way whether the succession was to the life interest only or to the possession of the estate, where the possessor would be competent to dispose of the property.

SIR W. HARCOURT reminded the right hon. Gentleman that in this case they were dealing only with the question where property passed in fee-simple, where the successor was competent to dispose of the property, and there the Government said that the valuation ought to be upon the principal value. In this clause they did not touch life interest coming under the Succession Duties.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, his point was that the annual value for the purpose of arriving at the life interest should be calculated in the same way, and that the same deductions should be made as were allowed in calculating the principal value. Under the clause as amended by his right hon. Friend the principal value of agricultural property was not to exceed 25 years' purchase of the annual value. Obviously where the successor took a life interest he should not have to pay at a higher rate than the successor who was competent to dispose of the estate.

SIR W. HARCOURT again pointed out that in the case of life interests Succession Duty was payable, and that in the case of fee-simples the principal value was the question. That must be borne in mind in measuring the value in the two cases.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not wish to interfere in the discussion if there was a probability of agreement, but he would submit that the Government ought to deal with life interest exactly as they dealt with complete interests. His hon. Friend had stated the case quite accurately in one point of view though not in another. Capital value was not ascertained from annual value, but was based on the selling value at the time of the death of the deceased. That was the basis of calculation for purposes of Estate Duty, though not in the case of Succession Duty where the estate passed to the heir. He did not agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that they were dealing merely with the life interest. Exactly the same rule should be applied. Take in illustration the case of a man coming into an estate of £10,000 a year arising from high rents with great probability of a large fall and the possibility of foreign competition in produce. It would be very likely that he would not have £10,000 a year during the currency of his life interest, and he ought to be charged at a smaller rate. The true way to arrive at that would be in the way suggested, and not as though he were owner of a property of that particular capital value. That was clearly the logical and ethical aspect of the matter, and whether it was the proposal of the Government or of his right hon. Friend in that way the scheme would be carried out on a logical basis. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Solicitor General would see that this placed the question in an altogether new light from that in which it had been presented by other speakers, and he thought the matter deserved the serious consideration of the Government.

SIR W. HARCOURT was more inclined to favour the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol than the view of the Leader of the Opposition.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH felt quite satisfied that the argument of his right hon. Friend was perfectly logical and fair, but he was not surprised at the reluctance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accept it in dealing with this matter.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) pointed out that the exemption would not go so far as was supposed. If the property was valued for a period of years the principal value could be ascertained. All that his right hon. Friend advocated was that the annual value of life interests in all properties should be calculated by the method now adopted in calculating the annual value of property of a fluctuating character.

MR. BYRNE understood the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion to be that in order to get the true value of limited interests they should be calculated in precisely the same way as the value of entire interests, by first of all taking the whole value of the property and then ascertaining what the value was on that basis.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

*MR. H. HOBHOUSE said, he objected to the clause for three reasons. In the first place, the Government had thought it right to deal in the present portion of the Bill with one anomaly only of the Succession Duty. He thought they might have gone a little further, and those who had listened to the Debate for the last half hour would admit that this part of the Bill was a most incomplete one as it stood. He did not think the Government themselves would maintain that this was a satisfactory way of disposing of the great questions dealt with. His second reason for objecting to the clause was that it involved another burden on real property. It was of no use going further into that argument. The single answer of the Government to complaints of that kind was, "We are establishing equality of taxation," but they persistently shut their eyes to all inequality of taxation except that within the narrow purview of the Death Duties. He did not think there would be in the country, at all events, much difficulty in pointing out that, however equal Death Duties might be on real and personal property, there would remain great anomalies in the way real and personal property was taxed for other purposes. Although the Government had made certain concessions—which he readily admitted—in the method of valuing real property and exemption from Income Tax, and though the Government agreed to continue the present contribution to local taxation, he thought they ought clearly to understand that the Opposition did not think those concessions sufficient. He must support the view of other agricultural Members, that when they were throwing much larger burdens for the sake of equality on real property in one direction, they might, on the other hand, have done something to alleviate the injustice and inequality of local taxation as regarded the same class of property. Of course, gentlemen who represented the monied rather than the landed interest were well content with this so-called equality of taxation. They were, no doubt, content that land should pay an equal share of the Death Duties, while personal property did not pay its equal share of local taxation. He feared it was useless to press the argument further, but he felt bound to raise it before this clause was finally passed. But he had a third and distinct reason for objecting to the clause, and it was that it was one of the many provisions in the Bill which tended to encourage the settlement of real property. He knew the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought he was giving no fiscal advantage to one class of property; but he ventured to say that in the future every prudent man who possessed landed property would consider whether he ought not, in justice to the pecuniary interests of his family, to at once make a settlement. Personally, he had always held strong views on the question, but he must say his views had been considerably modified by proposed changes in the law, settled estate receiving advantages, and the preference that now existed in favour of an absolute disposal being about to be removed. This Bill would be from start to finish a great benefit to the family lawyer. He was the person who, next to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would most profit by the Bill, and he (Mr. Hobhouse) was sorry that that should be the case. Many hon. Members who opposed the Bill believed much more than he did in the benefits of settlement; but he would appeal to hon. Members who supported the Bill not to lessen the inducements to people not to tie up landed property. The striking out of this clause would not effect a substantial loss in the present year's Revenue. It stood apart from the rest of the Bill; therefore, he would ask the Committee not to pass it without considering before it was incorporated in the general law whether it ought not to be rejected because it was incomplete and unjust, and not beneficial in its operation.

*SIR W. HARCOURT (whose observations were almost inaudible in the Gallery) was understood to say that the hon. Member had said that the family lawyers were the people who would derive most benefit under the Bill. If that were so, he was sorry to say that family lawyers were a most ungrateful class, for a class who more sedulously worked against the Bill he did not know. The hon. and learned Member seemed to have misapprehended what his own views were in regard to the settling of property. He had never desired to promote in any way settlements of landed estates. Indeed, he had wished to impose upon settled property an extra duty in order to countervail the advantages that that class of property at present enjoyed. Taking the case of a freehold estate of the value of £10,000 with a net rental of £400 a year, a person entering into possession of that estate would at present, if one year old, pay duty upon £7,569; if 21 years old he would pay duty upon £6,879; if 40 years old upon £5,950; if 50 years old upon £4,971; if 70 years old upon £2,709, and if 90 years old upon £533 only. If the same land were leasehold instead of freehold the person to whom it was left would pay Probate Duty and Succession Duty also if he was liable to a higher rate of Succession Duty than 1 per cent. In face of such an anomalous exemption in the case of freehold property, how was it possible for the Government, in revising the Death Duties, to leave this grossest of all inequalities uncorrected? Unless hon. Members opposite were prepared to say that freehold land, because it was freehold, should pay only about half as much as if it were leasehold property, there was no hardship involved in the proposal of the Government.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, before the Chairman left the Chair for the usual interval, he had risen to put a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the figures that right hon. Gentleman had quoted. He had been astonished at some of the results brought out by those figures with regard to land, and had wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman to repeat his figures. As, however, the right hon. Gentleman was not present, he (Sir R. Temple) must make the best case he could. The hon. Member for Somersetshire (Mr. H. Hobhouse) had said with great truth that this clause, together with other clauses, sinned in respect of the inequalities between real and personal property. It was argued on behalf of the Bill that the Death Duties would be equalised with regard to real and personal property, but it seemed to be forgotten that in other kinds of taxation there was an utter inequality between the two. He was surprised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not condescended to reply to the very forcible and impressive speech of the hon. Member for Somersetshire on the subject. Did the Government, or did they not, admit that there was a great inequality between personalty and realty in respect of local taxation? If they did admit it, what became of the argument respecting the justice of their present proposal? If the inequality in regard to local taxation were to be permitted to continue, why should not the inequality with reference to the Death Duties be permitted to continue also? Why was the inequality to be remedied as against land on the Death Duties, and the inequality against land on local taxation to be allowed to remain? Of course, the Chancellor of the Exchequer knew that it was of no good to attempt the impossible task of answering the argument of the hon. Member for Somersetshire, who was one of the best informed men in the House on the subject, and he had therefore left it alone. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had read some very interesting quotations from a publication by the Under Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. S. Buxton), and then had turned round triumphantly towards the hon. Member for Somersetshire, and said, "Does it come to this: that land is for the purpose of the Death Duties to be taxed only half as much as personalty, because it is land?" There were two very strong reasons why land should be taxed at a lower rate than personalty. The first of these was that it was subjected to an unfair amount of local taxation, and the second had reference to the matter of valuation. Unless his ears had deceived him, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had read some figures which stated that £10,000 worth of land would yield an income of £400 a year. Such a statement was all moonshine, and he could not understand what the Chancellor of the Exchequer meant by reading to the Committee so absurd a calculation. If these were the kind of calculations on which the taxation proposals of the Government were framed, then Heaven help them! The system of valuation on which land was taxed was worth nothing at all. Value meant what a thing was worth—

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): What it will sell for.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, that what it would sell for was based upon what it was worth. All the calculations on which the valuation was made were based upon a presumed income which was never received, or very little of which went through the fingers of the owner. If a man had £100,000 in Stocks, he got from £2,000 to £3,000 a year for it; but if a man had land that was valued at £100,000, he received nothing like that income. Very few hon. Gentlemen and right hon. Gentlemen who sat on the Front Bench opposite were landlords, and knew anything about the sorrows, cares, and vicissitudes of those who owned land. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, he believed, had carried an Amendment under which, for the purposes of the Bill, land was to be valued at its market value. If that were done, it would leave little to be desired. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India had said across the Table that the market value was what the land would sell for. If that were the value of land the Exchequer would get very little; but that, he thought, was too good for the unfortunate landowners. But he had heard from his right hon. Leader that this "market value" was to be the Income Tax assessment. [Mr. H. H. FOWLER: No, no.] He was informed that that was what the right hon. Gentleman had said, and he had no doubt it was right. Land would fetch hardly anything. People who owned farms dared not put them into the market for fear of the ridiculous and melancholy results which would occur. Land had no market value at present in this country, owing to the utter depreciation of that class of property. The opinion of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue was to be taken. No doubt it would be based on the old traditions of what land used to yield 10 or even five years ago, but such a basis would be altogether fallacious and unjust. The opinion of these officials would scourge landowners with mercilessness. As to the Income Tax assessment, that was something which they were supposed to get, but which they never realised. There was a certain sort of theoretical notion that a certain farm was worth, say, £200 a year, or a certain small estate £400 a year. But the theoretical value placed on land would never be received by the unfortunate payer of Death Duties. And that was one reason why nowadays land was so grossly overtaxed—because it was so overvalued. None but landowners could have any idea of how much the income from land was cut down nowadays. Speaking in the presence of the late Minister for Agriculture, and of men who knew a great deal more than he did about these matters—although he knew something about them, and wished he did not know so much—he asserted that the amount now realised by land was very little. That was urged as an argument why it should be taxed less than personalty. While the income from personalty was certain and known, that from land was most variable and uncertain. If they had £100,000 in the funds they knew they were going to get £2,500 a year for it. If the capital was in land not only would they not get £2,500, but they did not know whether they would get anything at all. In some years they might not get enough to discharge the liabilities on the land. When these things happened, what was the use of talking about valuation and of telling them that land was taxed only at half so much as it was worth? He would mention in the fewest words how incomes were reduced. There was a dreadful fall in prices going on. There was a fall in 1890. Wheat had fallen in price from 27s. to 25s., and now to 23s. 9d., and every one of them, he ventured to say, would hear of it when they came to the Michaelmas audit. What was the use of talking about incomes from land when such depreciation as that existed? They had had constant bad seasons. He would tell gentlemen who did not own land that every one of those bad seasons compelled them to make abatements. Look at the constant notices in the papers: "Lord So-and-So has given 15 per cent. reduction to his tenants." Smaller landlords had to do the same. A man might be nominally receiving £1,000 a year, but he would have to remit £200. Then there were the personal failures of the farmers. He wished to speak with great respect of a good class of men, who had borne up against their misfortunes with heroic fortitude; but they were on the brink of ruin. Now and again something went wrong, and a man failed. He did not leave the farm—they did not turn him out; but he could not pay his rent, and down went the landowner's income. There was never any credit given for this sort of thing on the valuation. Then, when a farmer who had managed to get over all his difficulties died, the landowner was at once in trouble with the farm. The farmer might never have paid the full rent; the new tenant would take advantage of the opportunity of saying that the land had been left in a foul condition (they all said that of their predecessors), and an abatement would have to be given. Then there would have to be a repair of the farmhouse and of the whole property. That would go against the current revenue. Every time a farmer died, in fact, it meant a heavy reduction. Furthermore, there was constant up-keep. Almost all the farmhouses in England were old. No man could say when the old houses might want repair or how long they would last. Nothing was deducted on that head from the valuation. Then there were constant drains on the landowner's purse, not in his capacity of a Christian or citizen or gentleman, but because he was a landowner. No credit was given to them for that, although it was well-known to constitute a substantial reduction from one's yearly income from the land. For all these reasons—which were indisputable—he said that the valuation of the land for all practical purposes was excessive, and must necessarily be so; and, therefore, nominally land ought not to be taxed so highly as personal property. Despite the statements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he believed that realty was taxed as high as personalty, even for death. They were rapidly arriving at prairie value, and landowners would hold their farms for much the same reason as they held their gardens and parks. It was a pleasure to hold land, and to know that one was the owner of all the land within sight of one's house; but he did not know what financial advantage was to be derived from it. They got no income from it—or very little. The income, he could assure the Committee, was so absurdly small that most of them would be ashamed to confess what it was. This was the truth, and it ought to be told to the House of Commons by those who knew. This was the answer which he ventured to give in the most positive form to the triumphant queries of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was well that he should hear from them some statement of the melancholy truth. The owners of real estate could not possibly pay down, because they would be unable to sell their property, and, that being the case, time ought to be given them. That would be an act of the commonest elementary justice, and yet this grasping Government ventured to demand interest at 3 per cent. per annum. That proposal would cause deep indignation in the minds of those who had to pay it, or their successors, and would give rise to a similar feeling throughout the country. That feeling would become accentuated as time went on, and the provision was so extreme and unjust that men would feel themselves morally justified in adopting every means that a family lawyer or ingenious agent could devise for the purpose of evading its iniquitous terms.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE, (Rochester) said, that prima facie it was a most sensible and satisfactory arrangement that the duty which a man paid upon his succession should be to some extent limited by the prospect which he had of enjoying it to the end of his life, and why should they depart from it in respect to the Succession Duty under this clause? The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the present condition of things was an anomaly. But he was not afraid of the word "anomaly," for they had a great many anomalies in England. He did not understand this Continental love of symmetry which the present Government had adopted, and which induced them to pass provisions which were really unjust. This symmetry appeared to be defended in two directions: In the first place, it was said that the way the Succession Duty was calculated ought to be the same way as the Estate Duty. In the second place, it was said that realty and personalty ought to be on the same basis. He asserted that the Government were estopped from using the first argument. The Leader of the Opposition had pointed out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that in respect of those who were going to enjoy only a life interest the Succession Duty was not be calculated upon the same basis as the Estate Duty, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer accepted that. Therefore, the Government were not entitled to say that they were placing the Succession Duty and the Estate Duty on the same basis, because in a very important division of it—namely, cases of life interest—the Estate and Succession Duty were not upon the same footing. There was no reason why they should be on the same basis in regard to fee-simple any more than life interest. But the symmetry upon which the Chancellor of the Exchequer chiefly relied was the symmetry and the similarity which ought to exist between the basis of the calculation of realty and the basis of the calculation of personalty. It was very difficult for them to persuade the Chancellor of the Exchequer that in asserting that position he was ignoring very obvious and elementary facts in the ownership of real property. The right hon. Gentleman must know that the customary charges upon the owners of real property were far larger and far more important than those which the owners of personal property had to bear. Anybody who knew country life as he did knew perfectly well that there was a certain amount of expenses which the landed proprietor was expected to incur. He made no complaint of that; it was a state of things which had existed a great many years. Landed proprietors were perfectly prepared to undergo that expense. It was well known that they gave subscriptions on a much larger scale than the owners of personal property did. [Cries of "No, no!"] He said they did. They built cottages for their labourers, which did not pay, and could not be expected to pay. It was, of course, from the point of view a great credit to them that they, above all other classes of the community, were expected to do public service for nothing, and at a great cost to themselves. It must be understood he made no complaint whatever with regard to those charges and obligations upon landowners. But they did furnish very strong reason that further heavy charges should not be placed upon them. He had no hesitation in saying that the result of now throwing an extra and extreme burden on the owners of land could only have one effect—that they would become non-resident landowners. It was from that point of view he wanted the Chancellor of the Exchequer to contemplate the issue before him. Would it be for the public interest that the number of absentee landlords should be increased? If any moral could be drawn from recent politics it was that efforts should be made to induce landed proprietors and rather wealthy men to reside in the country among the people. An absent proprietor was generally regarded as one of the greatest evils that could be inflicted on a country district; and if it could be shown that this enormous weight of taxation which was to be thrown upon the landed interest during the earlier years of ownership would almost inevitably result in absenteeism, then the system which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was seeking to establish would stand self-condemned. They were bound to consider the question from a public point of view, and they knew that from the point of view of their labourers and tenants it would be a great public evil if the landlords should be driven from the land. He believed that the provisions of the Bill, especially in regard to land, would be found to be intolerable, and that this method of attacking the landed interest would prove not to be of a permanent character.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think, Sir, that the speech to which we have just listened is of a very instructive and interesting character. It amply justifies the statement I made earlier in the evening, and to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury replied, as to the view which is really taken by the landed interest of their position with reference to taxation. The noble Lord said that it would be for the public benefit that the great landlords should reside on their estates.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Not only great landlords, but all landowners.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Well, that all landlords should reside on their property. The noble Lord has admitted that under the Succession Duty they are more favourably treated than under the Legacy Duty.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE said, the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken. He did not admit for a moment that they were better treated. What he said was that the landowner would be better treated if the Amendment was carried than he would be if it was rejected.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Well, the object of this proposal is to put Estate Duty on the same footing as Succession Duty, and the noble Lord says if that is done it will create absentee landlords. Therefore, he calls upon us to abstain from altering the law in this respect on account of the peculiar position of landlords. Now, I am as unwilling as the noble Lord can be that the landlords of England should become absentees; but unfortunately I have seen so many years that I have heard this, I will not say menace, but this anticipation of evil, this cry of wolf, so often that I have ceased to be alarmed at it. From my youth I have heard it said that if you expose the landlords of England to any sort of treatment to which they have not been accustomed; that if you deprive them of any of those advantages which they have enjoyed for generations, they would leave the country. There was a great example of it in a menace by which the politics of England in old days were greatly influenced. One of the Sovereigns of England always said, when any legislation was proposed of which he disapproved, that if it were carried he would go to Hanover. And now it is said that if we make the Succession Duty equal with the Legacy Duty the landlords of England will become absentees. I must say that that is not an argument which convinces me; I do not believe that the landlords of England will become absentees. I do not think that that is an argument worthy of those on whose behalf it is advanced. I do not believe that the noble Lord and his family will become absentees because of this change in the law which we propose to effect. I believe that, even if this proposal becomes law, the noble Lord and his race will remain in the County of Hertford for many generations to come, and, therefore, I may console myself by the reflection that I am not responsible for the expulsion of the landlords from this country generally or of the noble Lord and his family in particular. It seems to me that the noble Lord has given utterance to "the fears of the brave and the follies of the wise." I think that those who possess large estates in this country will not be reduced to such destitution as will induce them to leave the country, even if the Succession Duty is increased beyond the point at which it is now proposed to fix it. I think that it is a pity that such arguments as these should be put forward. I believe that the apprehensions of the noble Lord on this subject are not well founded, and I only regret that they should have been given utterance to by a member of that great race who have deserved well of their country for generations in the past, and who, I have no doubt, will deserve well of their country for generations to come. I hope that the Committee will not be deterred from doing what is clearly an act of justice to those who have not been so well favoured by fortune by the arguments to which we have just listened.

Sir W. Harcourt

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I cannot think that the tone, somewhat of banter, with which the right hon. Gentleman has approached this question is quite the spirit in which the subject ought to be dealt with. This question is one which the landlords, rightly or wrongly, regard as being of extreme gravity, not so much for themselves as for those amongst whom they live, many of whom in the past had been depeudent upon them. The right hon. Gentleman says that he shares in no way whatever the apprehensions expressed by my noble Friend, but I differ on that point altogether from the right hon. Gentleman. In the course of my career I have had some opportunity of making myself acquainted with the position of the landlords of this country in the past and with their probable position in the future, and I have come to exactly the opposite conclusion with regard to that position in the future to that at which the right hon. Gentleman has arrived. I frankly confess that I view the right hon. Gentleman's proposals with the gravest possible apprehension, and I am somewhat surprised that after the multitude of earnest representations which have been made to him from all sections of the House the right hon. Gentleman should continue to treat this question so lightly, as though it is a matter of very small importance to those who are mainly interested in it. I must say that I think my hon. Friend who moved the Amendment was absolutely justified in doing so by one reason, and one reason alone, and that is that throughout the whole course of the Debates the Government have never attempted on one single occasion to meet the arguments or the objections we have urged to their proposals. The right hon. Gentleman has said over and over again that the object of this Bill is to equalise taxation, but we have shown over and over again that it would do exactly the reverse. For this reason I feel bound to repeat my arguments upon this question, in the hope that at length I may elicit from the Government some answer to them. The Government are attempting to deal precisely in the same way with two classes of property which are absolutely and essentially different in their nature. Let me come to the last reply of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman says he does not believe that the landlords of this country will become absentees. No more do I believe that they will, as long as it is possible for them to remain there. But what we contend is that owing to this new legislation of the right hon. Gentleman the position of hundreds of landlords throughout the country, which is bad and critical enough at the present moment, will become such that they will absolutely have no choice in the matter. Now, may I be allowed to call, for a second time, the attention of the right hon. Gentleman—I do not know whether he heard it, for I do not remember whether he was in the House at the time—to some evidence which I adduced, I think, on the Second Reading of this Bill, or on a former Resolution. What was it? I quoted from some evidence given before the Agricultural Commission, the whole of which has now been laid upon the Table, and to which the right hon. Gentleman and every other Member has access. What my hon. Friends behind me have been talking about and trying to press upon the Government has happened in some counties in England already. I quoted the evidence of Mr. Clare Read with regard to the County of Norfolk. He said that throughout the whole of that county at the present moment—I have not the figures with me, but it was to this effect—so great was the depression, and so severely had it been felt there, that there were probably not more than 17 owners of land who were able to continue to reside upon their properties. That is the state of things which the right hon. Gentleman is going to accentuate so far as he finds it possible by the Bill to do so. Let me repeat this—we are not objecting to your proposals as the main ground that they will inflict an injury upon the landlords. Whether you believe so or whether you do not, what we have in our minds is this—and we speak from an experience and knowledge of the subject which I respect is greater than that of some gentlemen opposite—we object to the proposals because we know that those who will be most injured by them will be the humbler classes. If you have any doubt upon this point, will you allow me again to call your attention to the point I raised on a former occasion which no Member of the Government, and not one single gentleman opposite, has ever noticed, or paid the slightest attention to. I might have preached to deaf ears

—it might just as well never have been said; but still it remains absolutely true, and it is this—when you deride the idea of the humbler classes in the rural districts being affected by the legislation which you are proposing now, will you remember what proportion of the wages that are earned by agricultural labourers throughout England, at the present time, are earned from those whom you are going to render, in a vast number of instances, incapable of paying those wages in future. The right hon. Gentleman this afternoon said that it was a question of a few less servants, a few less gardeners, a few less horses being kept in the establishments of the great landowners of the country. Sir, it is nothing of the kind. The right hon. Gentleman must know that there are a great number of necessary outgoings on an estate, if the owner of the land is to do his duty by the estate, and if it is to be maintained in a condition in which even gentlemen opposite would desire to see an estate in this country maintained. If that be so, how is it possible to reject the inference that you are going to injure that class of which I speak. I have here a quotation from a Report which I must refer to again, and which I desire to bring to the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his colleagues. It is a Report prepared for their own Government and submitted to the Board of Trade only two years ago—prepared by a gentleman eminent in the Civil Service, who is now the principal official on the Board of Agriculture. What is the result of his researches upon this point? He had to inquire into the amount of agricultural labourers' wages paid in the country, and the general result, in a word, is this: It amounts to something like £43,000,000 a year, and of that there is no less an amount paid than £9,000,000 a year by owners of land, apart altogether from the wages which are paid by the occupier. That is the fund you are going to interfere with. There is something to be deducted from that for gardeners, gamekeepers, and others of that class, but you cannot deny for a moment, unless the Report which has been drawn up for years is altogether erroneous, that there remains an enormous amount still which is paid in wages for necessary outgoings upon an estate. Well, if you are going to mulct the landowners and fine large estates in the manner in which you propose, and of which we are so apprehensive, can you yourselves deny that you will be placing the owner of property in such a position that it will not be able to meet the just and legitimate demands made upon it for its maintenance in a proper condition, and, consequently, to retain the vast amount of employment which hitherto it has been the means of sustaining? I am of opinion myself—whether hon. Gentlemen may share it or not—that what I may describe as the present territorial constitution of this country is to the great advantage of the community as a whole. I do not know what the views of others may be, but when I look around in other countries, whether I look to the Continent or to America, what do I find there? I know this—and I have travelled a good deal, and have had opportunities of studying the agricultural situation in many countries besides—and I say without reserve that I have never yet been in any country in the world where the position of the agricultural labourers, taken as a whole, is anything like so advantageous or so good for themselves as it is in England at the present time. I argue from that that there must be some advantage, at all events, for them in the present territorial constitution of this country. But that is exactly what you are attempting to destroy. Whether that is your object I will not say now. I really do not know what your object may be; but, undoubtedly, beyond all question that will be one of the chief and principal effects of your measure if it has the least of the results that you anticipate. To put it on no higher ground than that of political expediency, I do think that the right hon. Gentleman, even at this stage of our proceedings, would do well to modify some of the proposals in his Bill. You have heard again to-night from my hon. Friend behind me, the Member for Evesham, a touching description, and one no less true than touching, of the depression which exists in great parts of the country. Why, under these circumstances, should you seek to aggravate and increase the evils? I can well understand the very natural desire of any gentleman in the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer being glad to seize on an opportunity of making and creating a great reputation for himself as a great financial authority to be handed down to future generations. But even with all that in view, I should have thought that, at some self-sacrifice, perhaps, he might postpone this great achievement until times were a little less distressing to the agricultural interests of this country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is always professing great sympathy, with his lips, for the depression of agriculture and the classes connected with it, but I have yet failed to see any practical result whatever from these expressions. On the contrary, what we have seen, day after day, is this: that the right hon. Gentleman never loses an opportunity of taking some measure or other which is destined, whether he desires it or not, to add to and increase the existing evils. Of course, I know well we are in a minority in which we cannot hope to defeat the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. The Government never think it necessary to reply to our arguments. For the most part they sit silent, almost as silent as their supporters behind them. I suppose the Government think that anything is good enough as long as they are able to maintain their majority.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he had already made two speeches in regard to this proposal.

MR. CHAPLIN: Yes, that is quite true. The right hon. Gentleman may make a good deal more than two speeches, but he never answers our arguments. We complain of the injustice of the proposals, and he replies, "Yes, I have heard all this before. The landlords have only one desire, and that is to avoid paying their fair share towards the defences of the country." If we tell him that instead of equalising taxation he is doing exactly the reverse, he says, "That is only because you want to get off your fair share of taxation," and he has never once met us fairly or attempted to answer any one of the arguments that we have put forward. It does not show a very lofty idea, I think, on the part of the Government for the intelligence of their own supporters, but I suppose they think that as long as they can command their majority without replying to arguments, that is the best course they can take. I daresay that under the circumstances the Government may be right, but there remains the fact that the Government are taking a course in this particular proposal which we regard most undoubtedly as calculated to be most injurious to the poorer classes and the labourers who dwell in the rural districts of this country, and it is upon these grounds, and because we believe that will be the inevitable effect of the Bill—because probably we have as many opportunities of judging of its effects as gentlemen on the other side of the House—that we are opposed to the proposition of the Government, and I shall support this Amendment if my hon. Friend goes to a Division.

Mr. W. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) rose to oppose this clause being passed as part of the Bill upon the ground that it was cruel and oppressive in its character, and as such was unstatesmanlike. He also opposed it because the grounds upon which it was introduced were entirely unsupported by evidence, and, in fact, did not exist. The first ground alleged in its support was that it was to make the taxation of real estate equal to that of personal estate, and to prevent the supposed inequality. He denied that there was any such inequality. Treating the question from the point of view of the Imperial Revenue, apart from the question of local rates, he declared that there was no such inequality as that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had alleged. He also opposed this clause on other grounds, because he said that if it were desirable to make landed estate further liable to duty, this particular proposal was inexpedient and oppressive in its character, and therefore unstatesmanlike. As to the allegation that there was inequality in the incidence of taxation, and that this inequality was in favour of the land, he invited hon. Gentlemen to go through the Revenue accounts to see how landed estate and personalty were charged, and if they did so, he ventured to say, without fear of contradiction, they would find that there was nothing in respect of which personalty was charged with the exception of the Income and Property Tax and the Death Duties. With reference to the Income and Property Tax, the duties were equal both as regarded real and personal property. Before concluding that there was any inequality in taxation adverse to a proper charge on realty, they must consider the relative values of real and personal estate. What were the duties upon personal estate? The Death Duties, with the exception of the Income and Property Tax, were the only duties to which personalty was charged. He accepted the figures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to the Death Duties. The right hon. Gentleman said that from personal estate they had £8,910,000 raised by the Death Duties, and from realty they had only £1,150,000, so that substantially there was nearly £9,000,000 from personalty and only £1,150,000 from real estate, making a difference as against real estate of something like £7,750,000. They did not understand the comparative value of real and personal estate. They could not appear on an inequality. It was absurd to suppose that real estate was to pay a sum equal to what was paid by personal estate unless it was equal to the personal estate. All taxation should be proportionate to the value. If they had personal estate of the value of £100,000,000 and real estate of the value of only £50,000,000, it was absurd to pretend that they should have as much from the realty as from the personalty. They must, as he had said, before they concluded that there was any inequality in taxation, consider the relative values of real and personal estate. They had some guide as to that in the Returns relating to the Income and Property Tax. The Income Tax Returns showed that the amount assessed to Income and Property Tax was £710,000,000, and the proportion from real estate was £201,000,000, leaving a difference of about £500,000,000. These figures showed that, in order to prevent any inequality, personal estate ought to contribute two and a-half times as much as realty. He might say, further, in regard to this matter that the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself had given them the figure which, in his view, would be requisite to redress that grievance, and put the matter on a proper balance, because he told them that the real deficiency shown by the Death Duties between real and personal estate was £1,320,000, and he proceeded to show that that was reduced by some allowances made in respect of assessments of realty to the Income and Property Tax, which ultimately brought the taxation of land to £700,000, and of agricultural land to only £350,000, and the right hon. Gentleman concluded by saying that that was the amount which the landed interest of the country was required to contribute in order to pay its quota towards the defences of the country. He proposed to show that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had altogether left out of consideration very important items indeed to which the landed interest were subjected, and which must be considered when they came to the question of redressing grievances and turning the balance. He was now dealing with Imperial Revenue, throwing aside for the moment the question of local taxation. Of course, if it turned out that the balance was in favour of real estate there was then no ground for the increase contemplated in these duties, and for the attempt to put further burden upon real property. The first point to which he desired to call attention was the item under the heading of "stamps." There was a sum of over £13,000,000 raised by stamps, including £2,870,300 for deeds. He asserted, and he defied contradiction, that the great burden of taxation in regard to stamps fell on land. If they wanted a conveyance of land they must pay 10s. per cent. ad valorem duty. If they wanted a mortgage on land, a lease, or a mere agreement in respect of land, they had to pay duty upon every single one of these transactions, and they could not get out of it in any way whatever. But when they were dealing with personal estate it was a totally different question. If it was a matter of Consols, there was a general exemption in the Stamp Duty Act of all transfers, and no matter how large the amount so transferred, not a farthing was paid in respect of the transaction. Every transfer was exempt from taxation, why, he knew not, except it be to make a difference as against the landed interest and in favour of personal estate. Take ships, which were another great subject of property in this country. If they transferred a ship, sold, or mortgaged a ship under the general exemption in the Stamp Act of 1891, all these transactions might be and were concluded without any taxation whatever. Again, goods were also exempt from Stamp Duty, and millions might pass by invoice, or they might transfer millions from the bank from one person to another by a cheque on which there was merely a 1d. stamp. So far, therefore, from any favour being shown to real estate, it was exactly the contrary. Take, again, the figure in the Return in respect to deeds, £2,872,000. He would make from that the liberal allowance in respect of personalty of £872,000. That would leave a sum of £2,000,000 of duties raised from real estate of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had never said a word, and of which no account whatever had been taken. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had put the Estate Duty at present raised from real estate at £1,150,000. Then they had the further duty of the Land Tax, amounting to £1,035,000. He wanted to know why that item was going to be ignored? Could anybody doubt that that was a tax and a burden upon the land, which tax went to the Imperial Revenue. Then there was the House Duty, amounting to £1,425,000. Was that upon land or not? "Oh," said the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "that was paid by the occupier of the house!" Yes, but could anyone doubt that the occupier did not take that into account when he undertook to pay the rent? The burdens imposed on the land for the Imperial Revenue amounted altogether to £5,610,000, as compared with £8,910,000 for personalty, and therefore the story, which they heard so often that they were sick of hearing it, of land not bearing its fair share of taxation, as compared with personalty, was not true. The boot, in fact, was on the other leg, and even on the question of Imperial Revenue real estate paid in excess of that paid in respect of personalty. But he objected entirely to the principle that they were to deal with the question as one of Imperial Revenue only. Why should the contributions to the Imperial Exchequer alone be considered? The local rates, which were borne exclusively by real property, were it was true imposed by Local Authorities, but they were practically Imperial taxation, because the local taxing authorities derived their powers of taxation from the Imperial Parliament. They were the mere delegates of this Parliament for the purpose of conducting local taxation, and when they levied taxes they did so by the authority of the Imperial Parliament, and they could not do so except in so far as they were authorised by this Parliament. The taxes, therefore, imposed by Local Authorities were taxes equally imposed by this Imperial Parliament, and it was idle to contend that they could be thrown out of question altogether. He heard the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney), in a recent Debate, say there was a good reason why personalty could not be taxed, and that was because they could not find the individual. That was exactly the case. Personalty escaped the local burdens because it was not always there. It was here to-day and gone to-morrow, and they could not lay hold of it. They rarely got hold of personal property, a vast amount of which escaped death and all other duties, because there was an opportunity of evading such duties. The Secretary for India, in a recent speech, put the local taxation at £28,000,000, and when dealing with the question the right hon. Gentleman went on to show that there had been no increase in the taxation on land in recent years. But the materiality of that point seemed to him (Mr. Ambrose) altogether beside the question. The point was not whether there had been an increase of taxation upon land, but whether land paid its fair share of taxation. The right hon. Gentleman said the tax was as old as the time of Elizabeth, and was, on that account, one of the burdens on land. Land had borne burdens for ages past, while personal property had been exempted. How, then, could this taxation be said to be equal simply because real estate had old burdens to bear? He desired to be saved from such arguments as those by which the Government were trying to support their case. It might, on the contrary, be urged that those who had borne the burden and heat of the day were now entitled to some relief, instead of having their liabilities increased. Even if the taxes upon land were to be increased, this was a cruel and oppressive mode of levying them. It might be all very well in the case of great landed proprietors, for to them this would be a matter of small importance. Of them as knowledge was little; but he knew something of lesser people, tradesmen and others who, by saving during long years, had become possessed of a house and perhaps adjoining land. That property would probably be left to the widow and afterwards to the children. His point was that if increased taxes were to be levied on land, this was a cruel and oppressive mode of doing it, particularly in the case of small proprietors—people who had saved a little money—say, £10,000, and who had bought say, a house and a farm, or taken a professional man of that class. He died and left £10,000 to the widow. It was all she had. She would have to pay £404 Death Duties, £100 more on the estate, and altogether she would have to pay about £600 on the £10,000. He asked the Committee was that taxation? No, it was a fine such as would have been put upon an individual in former times for some serious offence. It went in no small degree towards the impoverishment of the family. Taxation should be made as convenient as possible, and, above all things, there should be no element of uncertainty about it. But the value of land, which was now to be the basis of the tax, must be a mere matter of opinion until the land was sold. The Ministerial proposal, therefore, came to this: that an owner of land was to be taxed on a value which could only be ascertained accurately by sale. That plan, in his opinion, was not statesman-like, and the inequalities they were creating would speedily have to be redressed. Taxation should always be levied upon a fixed basis which could be ascertained with some certainty, and should not be imposed in a way which made it a matter of mere speculation.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 129; Noes 94.—(Division List, No. 123.)

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 16.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE moved an Amendment, to leave out the words "one and a half per cent. on the net value," and to insert instead "one half of the proceeds of the Estate Duty on." He pointed out that under the Local Government Act of 1888, and also by the provisions in other Acts of Parliament, half the Probate Duty had since that year been applied towards defraying local expenses which otherwise would have had to be met out of the rates. By this Bill the Probate Duty as a separate fund would cease to exist, and the question therefore must be considered what proportion of the new Estate Duty should be set aside by the Government for that purpose? He contended that the Local Authorities of the country should share the advantage which the Exchequer might reap in respect of the Probate Duty, which was not at all stationary, but was rising and improving, and half of which, as the late Chancellor of the Exchequer had formerly said, was to be permanently given up for purposes of local taxation. In making his Financial Statement on the 22nd of March, 1886 (Hansard, Vol. 324), the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the enormous increase in the rates, and said that this subsidy in relief of local taxation would be of great advantage to the poorer class of ratepayers throughout the Kingdom, and that no other relief that could be proposed would be equal to it. The intention of Parliament, clearly, in thus transferring this portion of the Probate Duty in relief of local taxation was, that it should be permanent, and that the Local Authorities therefore should have the advantage of any prosperity which might accrue. He would go further, and say that not only did Parliament intend to make the grant an increasing one, but that it intended to relieve burdens which had fallen exclusively on the real property of the country. It was admitted that real property bore the greater part of the burden of local taxation, and to bring the matter prominently before the minds of the Committee he would refer to a few salient figures, taking first the proportions in principal values of real and personal property in the Kingdom. Of course, the figures could only be approximate, for any attempt to gauge the value of real property at the present time must be an absolute guess; but he would take them from the best authority—that relied on by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself in making his Financial Statement this year. The amount realised from personalty was stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be about £11,000,000, against £2,500,000 realised from real property, or in the proportion of 22 to 5, showing that the estimated value of realty was less than one-fifth of the capitalised wealth of the Kingdom. Yet upon the realty fell more than four-fifths of the burdens of local taxation; the figures being, £28,500,000 out of £36,000,000. Did not that constitute a very strong claim to relief on the part of the owners of real property? If there was to be equality in Imperial taxation, should not that equality be also extended to the local taxation of the country? Certainly nothing had occurred in the course of this Debate, and there was nothing within the four corners of the Government Bill which could in the least impair that claim or render it one iota smaller. The Committee should also bear in mind that this money was to be handed over to popularly-elected bodies in relief of those who felt the burden of local taxation most severely. The feeling of occupiers of land, and popular opinion generally on the subject among agriculturists, could be gathered at any farmers' ordinary throughout the country. A resolution had been passed on the subject in Colchester that the whole system of taxation rendered cultivation hopeless, and that personal property in the shape of investments should bear its share. These proposals were not made simply because the landowners were in distressed circumstances, but were founded upon justice and fair-play. The only way in which personal property could be made to share effectively in burdens—from the proceeds of which personalty benefited equally with realty—was by means of the Probate Duty grant. He, therefore, asked the Committee not to depart from the principle laid down in the Local Government Act of 1888.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 17, to leave out the words "one and a half per cent. on the net value of," and insert the words "one half of the proceeds of the Estate Duty on."—(Mr. Heywood Johnstone.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am sure the hon. Member can only have put down this Amendment from a misconception of the facts of the case. He has said truly that, under the Act of 1888, half the Probate Duty is assigned for the assistance of local taxation. But that amount is preserved exactly as it was under this clause; that is to say, half the probate grant with the increments that may accrue on the growth—as the hon. Gentleman will see if he reads the clause. Founding himself upon that, the hon. Member proposes to take half of this new Estate Duty. That is a totally different thing. He seems to imagine that the new Estate Duty is identical and co-extensive with the Probate Duty under the Act of 1888. It is nothing of the kind. It embraces a large number of subjects which have no relation whatever to the Probate Duty.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE : I would call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the words of his own clause, which I can assure him I have carefully read and considered—

“On the net value of such of the property chargeable with Estate Duty as would, if this Act had not been passed, have been chargeable with the duty imposed by Section 27 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, or Inland Revenue affidavits.”

SIR W. HARCOURT : What the hon. Member by his Amendment proposes is to take one-half of the proceeds of the Estate Duty. [Cries of “No, no!”] It is not one-half of the Probate Duty of 1888. We preserve the Probate Duty of 1888 exactly as it was. But has the hon. Member observed what was done by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, in 1889? When the right hon. Gentleman imposed the Estate Duty of 1889, what share of that duty did he give to the Local Bodies? Why, none at all. There was a clause put into the Act of 1889 specially preventing Local Authorities from having any share whatever in that Estate Duty. It would be absolutely impossible to concede what is asked for by the hon. Gentleman. I have had a calculation made by the Inland Revenue authorities, and I find that the hon. Member's proposal would involve an additional grant out of the fund which is being raised of more than £1,000,000 sterling to Local Authorities. [Opposition cheers.] To Gentlemen opposite £1,000,000 is nothing to ask for. They would like to ask for several millions. But considering that we are raising this money to meet the exigencies of great public objects, I never heard, with the exception of Oliver asking for more, of anything more unreasonable than this demand. The idea of making this taxation a pretext for an additional demand as a substitute for local taxation is a most unreasonable demand made even in the course of these Debates.

MR. GOSCHEN : There are only two points with which I wish to deal in connection with this matter. The Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of the Estate

Duty of 1889, and said it was universally conceded that no portion of that Estate Duty should go in relief of local taxation. The right hon. Gentleman has never yet thoroughly understood the Estate Duty of 1889. Hon. Members opposite have always argued as if the Estate Duty of that year was a permanent duty; but that is not the case. It was a duty imposed for seven years, specially intended to meet the Naval Defence, and therefore it was not a permanent addition to the Death Duties. It was a special fund which now is being diverted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who never recognised either before, when he was in Opposition, or now that the Estate Duty was specially imposed for a particular purpose. If the right hon. Gentleman were to say that those Death Duties which he imposes should also be limited during a certain number of years, and that they should be specially considered as applicable to the important additions to the Navy which are contemplated, then there would be force in his argument both as regards precedent and the reasonableness of the proposition that the whole should be kept to the Imperial Government. But this appears to be a permanent addition, which the right hon. Gentleman contemplates not only to the use of the Navy, but in order to increase the resources of the country. No argument can, therefore, be derived from the Estate Duty of 1889. The right hon. Gentleman thinks it would be monstrous that Local Authorities should get another £1,000,000 from the funds which are wanted for purposes which are not yet declared to the House. These high Death Duties are not merely intended to meet the demands of this year or the next year, but they are intended simply to augment the resources of the country and to enable the right hon. Gentleman or a future Chancellor of the Exchequer, if necessary, to take off taxation elsewhere. I doubt whether a Chancellor of the Exchequer has ever before asked the House of Commons to impose high duties, not for the service of two or three particular years, but to augment the resources of the country for unknown purposes and for unknown schemes in future years. A fact like this, therefore, seems to me to place the present demand of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a totally different footing from previous instances. Towns are as deeply interested in this matter as lauded property; and it is not unreasonable that they should say if these additional duties are being imposed, and when they see local taxation rising year after year, "We should also receive, as on the principle of 1889, a further portion of the Death Duties." The Chancellor of the Exchequer has not proved that he wants the money; and if the duties are intended to increase the general resources of the country, it is highly natural that a class of ratepayers who are extremely pressed should say that out of this increase of funds they would like to see a further contribution made. There is another argument which I should like to mention. One of the great financiers of the Party opposite, who has guided them very much in their finance, is Lord Farrer, and he has with great ability not only attacked the finance of the late Government, but has put forward plans of his own. What were they? They were that the Death Duties should be localised, that further Death Duties should be imposed for local purposes. We are carrying out indirectly the policy of Lord Farrer. But what has the Chancellor of the Exchequer done? He has cut off from Lord Farrer the possibility of utilising the Death Duties for local taxation to any degree whatever. The right hon. Gentleman will admit that he has about reached the maximum in the case of the Death Duties. If they were able to bear more, no doubt the right hon. Gentleman would have increased the burden. Therefore, one of the resources to which Radical reformers of local taxation looked is being withdrawn from the possibilities of the future by the present Budget. It was conceded as part of the scheme of Lord Farrer, that the expenses of the Local Authorities will assuredly rise in the same proportion as the national expenditure, and is it wise to withdraw from them the possibility of allowing them some share of the future increment in connection with this taxation? It is on the same property that my hon. Friend wishes to take advantage of the higher scale. I have been anxious to show that there is nothing unreasonable in the Amendment of my hon. Friend, as would have appeared from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We can never forget that Imperial and local taxation must be taken together. It is unstatesmanlike to look forward to exhausting the resources of local taxation without showing by what means those resources can be increased. I will put this to hon. Members opposite: Do you or do you not expect the expenditure on local taxation to increase in the future? Do you consider the limit has been reached, and, if not, do you expect further burdens to be put on houses as well as on land in the future? Suppose the expenditure should increase in a few years by another £1,000,000. That is not a fantastic speculation at all. The more the conscience of the country is roused with regard to the Poor Law and the treatment of the poor the more is the expenditure on local taxation likely to increase. All that my hon. Friend asks for is some share in these available resources you are now imposing for the first time. I know that, more or less, there are many influences at work that will greatly increase local taxation. The other day I heard it was stated that in the last nine years the cost for Poor Law officers in the Metropolis alone has risen from £90,600 to £250,000. The question of trained nurses for Poor Law infirmaries has been before the Local Government Board quite lately, and it has been suggested that there should be a new scale of so many trained nurses to so many Boards of Guardians. I do not deny that such a policy may be necessary, but is it quite reasonable that the whole of future burdens of that sort, the whole of that tribute of philanthropy, should continue to be borne by the ratepayers in town and country? I do not know whether hon. Members opposite have any new sources of revenue in their minds by which to meet this increasing expenditure. If they have not, and if they see that the sources of revenue pointed out by their best advisers are being monopolised for Imperial purposes, do they think it is unreasonable that the ratepayers should endeavour to secure some small fraction with the view of meeting future burdens which may become too heavy to be borne by the shoulders which at present bear them?

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, they were assured that the object of the clause was to stereotype the arrangement of 1888 and not to alter it. If that was the object in view the words of the clause woefully failed of their object. The re-cult of this section, if carried as it stood, would be that people would dispose of their property during their lives. There would not be so much received under the Probate Duty, and in that way the contributions of these people to the public revenues would be cut down. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the supporters of the Amendment were prepared to claim several millions for the landed interest. Yes, they were prepared to claim several millions not only in the interest of the landowners, but also in the interest of the farmers and labourers. They were prepared to claim several millions which was necessary should be allowed in aid of local taxation if there was to be an equalisation of burdens between realty and personalty. In 1853, as he had already shown, when the Succession Duty was proposed the rates were 2s. 6 1-10d. in the £1, whereas in 1891 they were 3s. 7½d., so that, subvention or not, the rates had actually gone up. These figures he had used a month ago, and they had not been contradicted. The rates on houses also had gone up, so that before a word of the Bill passed realty paid more than personalty to the Imperial burdens of the country, as had been shown by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Harrow. If they took local and Imperial burdens together, realty paid far more than its share; and not only did it pay more than personalty, but from the Return of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the St. George's Division it was shown to pay more in England than was paid in any other European country. With that fact staring one in the face, how was there any justice in putting fresh burdens on realty and denying it relief? In this Bill they were putting Probate Duty on to realty; they had largely increased Succession Duty by making it payable on capital value instead of life interest. They asked that in this clause some extra relief should be given to local rates, and they were met by the answer that the demand was an absurd one. The whole principle of the Bill was to aggravate rates and to increase the duty on land. It would raise the burdens on land most injuriously. They asked that out of these extra duties and rates some little relief should be given back to the land. At any rate, they were entitled to a better answer than that their request was ridiculous.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, the question was, whether some additional advance should not be made from Imperial resources to aid local taxation, which fell so unequally on land as compared with personal property? It should be borne in mind that local taxation was likely to rise in consequence of the passing of the Parish Councils Bill and of the policy of the Education Department, which must lead to an extension of the School Board system. There was a question he would like to put to Her Majesty's Government. He and some hon. Friends near him had been wondering whether they rightly understood the effect of the clause, which, indeed, was very hard to understand by lay minds. There used to be a certain sum contributed from personalty in the shape of Probate Duty towards the relief of local taxation which fell on land. Now (and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would correct him if he was wrong) they imagined the case to be this: under the Bill that sum in future would be contributed half from personalty and half from real property. He hoped he was wrong. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to shake his head, and he (Sir R. Temple) trusted the right hon. Gentleman would put him right if he was wrong. But if he were right, or anywhere near right, the effect would be that the landed interest would once more be deprived of the benefit it had received from the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in the words of an hon. Member near him—

"The poor landed interest would be made to live by feeding upon its own dead."

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: I have not been willing to take any active part in promoting any Amendments to this Bill which I thought were absolutely inconsistent with the principle that the House sanctioned on the Second Reading, but I must say I am surprised at the reception the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given to the Amendment of my hon. Friend. What is the position? In 1888 Parliament voted with practical unanimity—I do not know that right hon. Gentlemen sitting opposite opposed the proposal—half the proceeds of the Probate Duty towards the relief of local taxation. Under this Bill the right hon. Gentleman proposes a very large increase under the Death Duties in the Imperial taxation upon realty as well as upon personalty. He places realty on a very much worse footing in regard both to Imperial and local taxation, taken together, than it occupied in 1888. This is no question of town or country, or attempt by the landlords to evade the payment of their fair share of the burdens of the country. This is a question of realty against invisible personalty, and I confess in my mind of realty in town more than of realty in the country. The right hon. Gentleman imposes a large increase, as I have said, on the burdens of realty throughout the country. My hon. Friend the Member for Sussex suggested that in the circumstances it is fair that the principle unanimously adopted in 1888 should be carried out now, and that half the proceeds of the Death Duty upon personalty should be devoted to the relief of realty in respect of local taxation. That suggestion the Chancellor of the Exchequer thinks proper to call absurd. For my part, I think a fairer proposal has never been made in this House. He says he would lose £1,000,000 by it. Well, I can quite understand that he feels himself compelled to think of nothing in this matter except the prospects of the Revenue. But we sit here as Representatives of the taxpayers. We are bound to consider what is fair upon the taxpayer and those who represent different classes of property. Every argument adduced convincingly in 1888 in support of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's applies with equal force to the present proposal of the hon. Member for Sussex. The right hon. Member for St. George's in 1888 left the Probate Duty, of which he gave half the proceeds towards local taxation, at 3 per cent., but now the Chancellor of the Exchequer adds to that a very large percentage increase in the case of properties of which the aggregate value is between £10,000 and £1,000,000. Those are the very properties which, when composed of personalty, ought to contribute more than they do now towards the burden of local taxation. I think it has been universally admitted that invisible personal property does not at present contribute its fair share. Under the existing system the possessors of invisible personalty of the value of £10,000 and upwards pay only 3 per cent. Probate Duty. They are in future to contribute more, and those upon whom the whole burden of rates now fall have a fair claim to a share of that increased contribution ; and nothing that the right hon. Gentleman has said has controverted the justice of this claim. He says he cannot afford it. I cannot believe for a moment that the Government will contend that the claim is not founded on justice. Can they contend that personalty—and I speak of invisible personalty throughout—bears its fair share of local taxation at present? Can they contend that invisible personalty can be reached for local taxation in any other way except through the Death Duties? Can they contend in opposition to what my right hon. Friend the Member for St. George's conclusively showed that the burdens of local taxation will diminish and not largely increase in the future? I think if the Chancellor of the Exchequer was unable, on account of the claims of Imperial expenditure upon him, to meet favourably the proposal of the hon. Member for Sussex, at least he might have admitted that the claim was founded on justice, and that having passed this Budget—if it becomes law—it will be his duty if in Office to deal with it. The right hon. Gentleman cannot contend, as some hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway might, that the whole of this policy of subventions from Imperial taxes towards local taxation is a mistake. ["Hear, hear!"] I hear that sentiment cheered. That view, I know, has been forced upon him by some of his supporters; but the right hon. Gentleman did not venture to carry it out, because he knew that if he brought forward any Motion to deprive the Local Authorities of those grants in aid of local taxation which they had enjoyed since 1888 he certainly would have been defeated. Then I am bound to say that, as the Government know they are unable to carry out that view, they cannot in fairness retain the subventions on their present basis. What I contend, and I am convinced that the argument cannot be controverted with any fairness or justice, is that, now that you are increasing the burdens of Imperial taxation on realty, the $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. that personalty pays towards local taxation is an insufficient contribution. We may be unable to enforce that fact successfully to-night; but we shall continue to put it forward on every possible opportunity, and I am convinced that the day will come when Parliament will as unanimously acknowledge its justice as Parliament acknowledged unanimously the justice of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's Division in 1888.

Sir M. Hicks-Beach

SIR W. HARCOURT: It would not be courteous if I did not say a word or two in reply to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He says that in 1888 a settlement was made as to the contribution to local taxation. Well, Sir, I do not expect the right hon. Gentleman to agree with me, nor can he expect us to agree with him, on this point. The right hon. Gentleman, however, must remember what I stated in the earlier part of the discussion, that after the settlement was made of the contributions to local taxation from the Imperial Revenue, the right hon. Member for Midlothian brought forward a Motion declaring that an equalisation of the Death Duties on all property would be a consequence of that settlement. The one is the correlative of the other. That is the view of the Government, and hon. Members opposite must not complain if the Government adhere to that which was solemnly put forward in the Motion to which I have referred. If the view of the right hon. Baronet were accepted, it would at once become my duty to apply for additional taxation for the purpose of making a further contribution to the Local Authorities. But that is not our view, and unless the right hon. Baronet is prepared to recommend that course the arguments he has addressed to the Government can have no weight. We do not consider that any contribution is due in that respect, and therein we differ from the view of the right hon. Baronet.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put the matter on rather a different footing from that it had previously occupied. He had said that different views were taken on the two sides of the House. He (Mr. Long) denied that that was the case, and challenged the right of the right hon. Gentleman to make such a statement. A few days ago he was present at a despatch in that House which was attended by hon. Members of both political Parties, and not one hon. Member controverted the assertion then made that the time had come when an addition should be made to the relief which had been given to local taxation by Imperial contribution. What was pressed upon the Opposition, and what they were trying to press on the Government, was that the contribution made by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer in aid of local rates was made on the basis which covered the contribution to the rates and taxes made by real and personal property as the taxation then existed. Now they were altering the basis of taxation. The Government told them they were putting real estate on a level with personal estate, and equalising the contributions, and yet they were making no additional contribution whatever out of this extra sum towards the relief of the ratepayers of the country. This burden would fall not on the landlords and tenant farmers—the time had gone by to plead for them—but it went far and away beyond them, and reached the owners of real estate in the large towns. The only argument used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that as this proposal would reduce very much the sum he would get from the new duty he could not agree to it. But there were many of these proprietors of real estate in towns who were suffering from the pressure of local rates, and who were already feeling that the contributions made by the Exchequer were not sufficiently large, and who felt that now that the State was about to call on real property to pay more in the shape of Death Duties there was an increased reason for equalising the burdens of local taxation. What was the suggestion of the Amendment? It was that when they were increasing the amount which the State was going to take, in the shape of Death Duties, from real property, it was only fair that they should increase the contribution of the State towards the relief of local taxation. They were going to make real estate pay more than it had been paying hitherto—pay on a more equal basis with personal estate, and yet they were going to leave the contribution made by personal estate towards local taxation at the same amount at which they found it at the present moment. It seemed to him that there was an evident injustice in that. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he made a great mistake if he thought this was a matter which affected only landowners and tenant-farmers. No doubt he felt that he could afford to treat with contempt the landowners of the country and the tenant farmers. [Cries of "No, no!"] It was all very well for

hon. Gentlemen to say "No!" When- ever arguments were addressed from the Opposition side of the House in support of landowners—[Cries of "Divide!"] He appealed to hon. Members. Could he have a better proof of the statements he had ventured to make than the friends of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, directly the landlords and tenant-farmers were mentioned, crying out "Divide, divide!" That was the one answer they received. But it was not in support of the landowner and tenant-farmer that he spoke. He saw gentlemen sitting opposite who outside the House were very loud in their complaints as to the pressure of rates on owners and occupiers of land. They were silent in the House. He should not be doing his duty as one of the representatives of the City of Liverpool if he did not say a few words on the Amendment, having, as he had already said, but lately heard a unanimous expression of opinion, not only from Liverpool but from all parts of the country, and from men of all political Parties begging them to press upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, as he was redressing what he was pleased to call inequalities between real and personal estate with reference to the Death Duties, the time had come when they ought to make a still greater grant in aid of local taxation. The right hon. Gentleman would dispose of the Amendment to-night as he had disposed of others—by his majority; but he ventured to say to the right hon. Gentleman, with all respect, that he would find that between the present time and that time next year the question of re-adjusting the burdens between real and personal estate would be pressed on him with great determination, and he would find that it was not a question as between the two sides of the House. He would find that there was a large and growing feeling in the House that real estate bore too large a share of the burden of local taxation.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 126; Noes 89.—(Division List, No. 124.)

THE CHAIRMAN: The other Amendments are out of Order.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that it was desired to raise certain points not raised by specific Amendments, and as he believed that two or three hon. Members desired to speak, he would move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he hoped the clause might be taken. He understood that the only question was the contribution to local rates, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London sought to raise in an Amendment as to the distribution of rates between London and other parts of the country. That had been ruled out of Order, and, of course, a discussion on the subject would also be out of Order. He had undertaken to appoint a Committee on the question, and he hoped the clause would be disposed of now.

SIR J. LUBBOCK asked when the Committee the right hon. Gentleman referred to would be appointed, and what would be its character?

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he would consult with Members before anything definite was decided.

MR. HANBURY said, there were points to be discussed on the clause in addition to that mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman. As far as he understood the clause, it was very vaguely worded, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not be able to go into the discussion of it to-night.

SIR J. LUBBOCK asked if the Committee would be appointed this Session?

SIR W. HARCOURT: If it is possible.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If Progress is now reported, I understand that so far as we are concerned the discussion of the clause will not occupy more than an hour on Monday.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I will not contest the point further.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC BILL.
(No. 156.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. Bryce, Aberdeen, S.)

said, he begged to move the Second Reading of this Bill. He believed there was a very general desire on the part of the House to get on with the measure. There were some who desired to go further, but the best course would be to pass the Bill in its present form. If it were allowed to pass the Second Reading, he would give every consideration to Amendments moved in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Bryce.)

Objection being taken to Further Proceeding,

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH* hoped that the House would be disposed to read the Bill a second time. He believed it would be impossible during the present Session to carry a Bill raising contentious matter. Though some persons might think that the Bill did not go far enough, he believed that both the Railway Companies and the traders admitted that a measure going as far as this was a necessity, and were prepared to support it. He trusted that after what the right hon. Gentleman had said—that he was not prepared to extend the provisions of the Bill—that the House would pass the Second Reading.

SIR A. ROLLIT* (Islington, S.) said that though, as a Member of the Committee, he thought, with others, that the Bill was inadequate to meet the necessities of the case, he would rather see it pass than have no Bill at all. The condition of things was so critical as to trade, so many accounts had to be adjusted, and the reasons for the amendment of the law were so great, that they accepted the Bill, reserving to themselves the right to propose Amendments in Committee.

SIR J. WHITEHEAD* (Leicester) said that, as having borne the brunt of this controversy for five years on behalf of the traders, he claimed the right to say a word. He did not intend to oppose the Second Reading, because he believed it was important that some measure of this kind should be carried in the present Session in order that the long outstanding accounts between the traders on the one side and the Companies on the other should be brought to a settlement. He was somewhat disappointed with the Bill, but he accepted it for the purpose of bringing about a settlement of accounts between the railways and the traders.

MR. W. LONG said, he would not enter into the merits of the question, but he considered it would be unfair towards the Companies—one of which he had the honour to be associated with—that the Bill should pass without one remark being made on their behalf. They were quite prepared that a measure such as that the right hon. Gentleman was responsible for should be passed into law, but they could not allow the Debate to pass to-night silently, or the Bill to pass without a full discussion, if it were not to be understood that this was not the final arrangement which was to be the result of the action of those who devoted themselves especially to the consideration of the railway rates. The matter was surrounded with difficulties. It would be impossible to go into it at length now; but while he and his friends assented to the proposal of the Government, it must not be supposed that they were prepared to make a wide departure from their principles.

SIR J. PEASE* (Durham, Barnard Castle) said, it was correct that the Railway Companies, as well as the traders, thought that this Bill should pass. It would clear away a great number of accounts in dispute, and put straight matters which were now very ragged, but the right hon. Gentleman would have to adhere to the principles laid down in the Bill. If other questions arose they would have to be left over for another Session.

MR. BARTLEY said, that here was a Bill concerning £900,000,000 of capital, and yet, because the Government had brought in Bill after Bill which they were not going to pass, they were not to have time to consider it. Everyone who had supported the Bill said it was not what it ought to be, and yet it was to be allowed to pass without discussion to enable the Government to bring before the House absurd Bills which they knew they could not pass. The country ought to know the way the Government dealt with these Bills.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 25th June 1894.

THE ASSASSINATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Earl of Rosebery): My Lords, I beg to give notice that to-morrow at the commencement of business I will move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to convey to Her Majesty the expression of deep sorrow and indignation with which this House has learned of the assassination of the President of the French Republic; and to pray Her Majesty, that in communicating her own sentiments on this deplorable event to the French Government, Her Majesty will also be graciously pleased to express on the part of this House their abhorrence of the crime, and their sympathy with the Government and people of France."

BIRTH OF A ROYAL PRINCE.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: I also beg to give notice that on Thursday at the commencement of business I will move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to congratulate Her Majesty on the birth of a son and heir to His Royal Highness the Duke of York and Her Royal Highness the Duchess of York."

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Moved,

"That the Motion for an Address to Her Majesty on the assassination of the President of the French Republic do take precedence of the other Notices and Orders of the Day To-morrow."—(The Lord President (E. Rosebery).)

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Moved,

"That the Motion for an Address of Congratulation to Her Majesty on the birth of a son and heir to His Royal Highness the Duke of York and Her Royal Highness the Duchess of York do take precedence of the other Notices and Orders of the Day on Thursday next.—(The Lord President (E. Rosebery).)

Motion agreed to.

VOL. XXVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

MEDICAL INSPECTORS AND CHOLERA SURVEY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF STRAFFORD asked whether the President of the Local Government Board had decided to retain the services for another year of the four temporary Medical Inspectors who were appointed in January, 1893; and whether the cholera survey of ports and inland districts, successfully conducted during the past 12 months, would be maintained for the present year? He said, it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that last year, when there was a danger of cholera reaching this country through our ports and spreading inland, four medical officers were temporarily appointed by the Local Government Board to supplement the good work then being done by the Medical Department of that Board—Drs. Wilson, Wheaton, Horne, and Evan-Evans. By the judicious way in which they applied themselves to the work the danger of infection was minimised, and a visitation of cholera averted. Europe was possibly in similar danger again this year, and, remembering the good work done on the previous occasion by the medical officers he had mentioned, he begged to ask the question of which he had given notice.

*LORD HAWKESBURY said, the Local Government Board fully appreciated the value of the services of the medical gentlemen alluded to in terms so kind and flattering by his noble Friend, and they quite coincided in his opinion. They had retained the services of those Inspectors until the completion of a second year. He had also to inform the noble Earl that the cholera survey of ports and inland districts was still being carried on, and would be maintained during the present year.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO CHILDREN BILL.—(No. 89.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee upon the said Bill."

VISCOUNT DRUMLANRIG said, as this was the first occasion on which he had had the honour of addressing their Lordships' House, he must bespeak the indulgence which they were accustomed to extend to maiden efforts. He would not detain their Lordships for any length of time. The chief points in the Bill would be touched upon presently, and dealt with by the Lord Chancellor with his usual ability, precision, clearness, and force. The Bill had been received by a sympathetic—nay, an enthusiastic House; every eye had looked kindly on it, and its passage was likely to be a triumphal progress. The long and weary struggle that was necessary to bring home the fearful facts to the understanding of the nation and to awake its conscience was over. They were happy in being born in the fulness of time; others had borne the burden and heat of the day, and they had entered into their labours when the harvest was already ripe. The Bill was safe as an Act already. But this Bill of 1894 (which was soon to break from its chrysalis state and emerge a full-grown Act), and even the Act of 1889, which had been rightly styled "The Children's Charter," were of themselves a mere heap of dead bones—a lamp, indeed, and set in a dark place, none darker, and furnished duly with wick and with oil and with all things necessary, and destined, who should doubt it, some day to shed a great light throughout the length and breadth of the land, and to bring hope to the hopeless and help to the helpless that had languished so long without hope or help, but a lamp set far above and out of the reach of those whom it was intended to light and to gladden with its beams, and waiting for the Lucifer who should bring down the fire from heaven to kindle it. For who were the section of the community for whose benefit that Act and this Bill had been brought forward? It was for the children of tender years, for those who were weak, ignorant, and helpless, very often babes in arms who could not even speak—just that section of the community which was totally and absolutely unable to make the smallest use of the legislation which was intended for their benefit and protection. When a Statute was passed for adults, for the benefit of any particular section, industry, or locality, and to redress any particular grievance, the section, industry, or locality was safely left to its own resources to put the Statute in motion. But in the case of the children it was different; they were unable to take means to protect themselves, and their natural protectors, their parents and guardians, were just the very persons against whom they required to be protected. If this sad fact were not the truth, and had not been abundantly shown to be the truth, there would be no necessity for and there would have been no such legislation such as was now before their Lordships' house. So that if they turned out this Bill from the legislative workshop it might be a perfectly finished tool, fashioned ready for use and tempered and sharpened to an edge; but if there was no agency able and willing to grasp it and to put it in use for those for whose benefit it was intended, they and their fellow-legislators in another place would simply have been occupied in spoiling so much good material, and their Act and Bill would be so much damaged and waste paper. If the dead bones were to have no quickening spirit breathed into them, but were to remain lifeless and inert, let them be taken to the charnel-house and given decent burial as speedily as might be. If the darkness was to reign on unbroken; if the lamp was to hang aloft unlit—that lamp which Parliament had so emphatically declared to be indispensable—surely it was a pity to waste good oil and wick on it. The only agency that had yet proved itself able and willing to breathe life into these dead bones and to light this lamp and keep it burning brightly was the Society which was the parent and author of this legislation, the agency which he had spoken of just now as having borne the burden and heat of the day. It had the machinery ready to hand, and in good working order; it had accumulated the experience necessary to set that machinery to work, and it had the will to make the best use of that experience. And what was the present position of this Society? Was it able to carry on the work it had done so nobly hitherto, and to extend that work? Unfortunately, it was not. With their Lordships' permission he would read from their Report what their present position was. The last Report of the Society said—

"With respect to the finances of the 10 years, the income has been £143,900 and the expenditure £148,900. The tenth year has been one of serious disaster. Had the rate of increase preserved during the Society's three preceding years been maintained in this year the income would have been £49,000. It actually reached only £39,500. During the year 1892-3 it increased by £11,750. During 1893-4 it increased only by £453. Immediately that the decrease of its income was seen the pace of extension of the Society's machinery was slackened, and its resources were confined chiefly to maintenance of existing agencies. At the close of the year 1892-3 the nucleus of a reserve fund was formed and money began to be set aside for new premises. These funds amounted to £3,200. The sudden disaster of the past year required the use of the whole of these funds. In spite of the expenditure on current account, the year closed with unpaid liabilities of £5,988. That it is even the dimmest doubt in the public mind as to the necessity of its work or the reasonableness of its methods which has brought the financial disaster of the Society in the past year nobody believes. It is found in the year's exceptionally great commercial frands, many of them unhappily connected with philanthropists, badness of trade, agricultural depression, and prolonged strikes which have told seriously on the means of the great middle class, from which the Society's resources are largely drawn."

Whatever might have been the final cause of the fact, the fact remained that the progress the Society was making towards a protectorate for the children of the whole land, and the making of children's lives what they ought to be, had during 1893-4 suffered a serious check, and the existence of the Society as a permanent institution had been imperilled. Until the children's treasury should be replenished the extension of protection to parts of the land in which it still did not exist was impossible. In a fifth part of the country the dumb and helpless sufferers must go on enduring their sufferings undiscovered and unhelped. The Report went on to say that a reserve fund was absolutely necessary to place the work beyond the chances of a rainless season, a prolonged strike, or a stupendous commercial fraud. An European war might make all past troubles insignificant. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals had a reserve fund of £70,000. And now what was the upshot of all this? It was put most shortly and pithily in the Report. The Finance and General Purposes Committee of the Society reported—

"(1) That on June 16 it owed to creditors £6,000; (2) that during the last year the Society reduced its expenditure on its staff and checked its expenditure upon the extension of its work. The weekly expenditure was £980, while the average weekly income of the Society in summer was £534, thus accumulating on the whole expenditure a further deficiency at the rate of £400 per week. The Committee therefore reported—(1) that the Society must at once appeal for £6,000 to discharge its present liabilities; (2) that it needed a deposit at the bank as a security for its expenditure in the months of June, July, August, and September of £5,000; (3) that it was of the utmost importance, in order to place the Society's work beyond the chances which happened in the commercial life of the country and to establish it upon a basis which was both permanent and sound, that it should have a reserve fund. The Committee recommended, in consequence of the present urgent needs—(1) that the Executive Committee should request its Chairman to write a letter to the public, to be issued through the papers, appealing for funds; (2) that the question of the reduction of the expenditure by the curtailment or giving up of some part of the Society's work should be deferred until the result of the appeal was known."

The question of the curtailment or giving up of some part of the Society's work now hung in the balance. Instead of being extended it might have to be curtailed. And now what could their Lordships' House do in the matter? There had been some mention lately of the disabilities under which Members of that House laboured. And one of those disabilities, which in this particular instance seemed a very heavy disability, was that they had no power over the nation's resources, and were unable by resolution or otherwise to devote any part of them to this or any other purpose. That was in their corporate capacity; but as individual Members they were not bound by any such restrictions, and among the other liberties they enjoyed was that cherished liberty of the Briton of being able to put their hands as deep into their own pockets as ever they liked. He hoped their Lordships would take full advantage of that liberty, for they might rest assured that if they did so, and would take their rightful place at the head of this great national movement, their example would be followed by the whole nation, and the actual gain to the children's cause and to our country's cause would be out of all proportion to their actual contributions, however magnificent they might be, and however worthy of the great aristocracy of which they were members.

THE EARL OF CRANBROOK: My Lords, I am glad to have the opportunity of saying a word in favour of this Bill, and of the conduct by the Society which has been referred to by the noble Lord of the work brought about by the former Act. I am afraid the noble Lord is a little sanguine in suggesting voluntary efforts on the part of this House as a means of supplying the requirements of that Society. But it is true that without the Society so many cases of cruelty to children would not have been discovered and punished, and had they not acted as a deterrent many more cases might have happened. I quite agree with the noble Lord in the eulogy he has passed on the Society. They have displayed tact and judgment in dealing with cases of a doubtful character, and have shown great energy in their proceedings in cases which were of a character to rouse public indignation. There are no money clauses in this Bill to provide for its operation, but I cannot help saying that in many cases much more effect would have been created if someone connected with the Public Prosecutor had been called upon to take charge of the prosecution, to show that the Government itself is interested in the suppression of such offences. Even if the Public Purse cannot be drawn upon for this purpose, some provision might, I think, be made to facilitate the obtaining of costs from those who have been culprits in such cases. I would only now suggest to my noble and learned Friend who has charge of the Bill that, if this Bill passes in its present form, he should take an early opportunity of consolidating into one Statute the law on this subject.

LORD NORTON said, there could not be a more important work than that done by the Society. But, important as was the subject, there never was a worse drawn Bill than this. It referred entirely to the Act of 1889, as, for instance, applying that Act to "assaults," in addition to "ill-treatment." He joined in hoping that the noble Lord would be able to consolidate this measure with the Act of 1889, so as to make it intelligible, and enable the operation of the two measures to be generally understood.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): Although it may have been necessary for Parliamentary purposes so to draw this Bill as to make it merely an amending Bill, as soon as I read the Bill I felt it would be a great misfortune if such a Bill were to pass without anything more. A Code of this kind for the protection of children and the punishment of those who ill-treat or improperly deal with them ought to be intelligible to the whole community, and therefore I have given instructions for a Consolidation Bill to be drafted as soon as this Bill has passed both Houses, so that the law may be found in a single Act.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Would it not be better to make this Bill intelligible in the meantime, because there is always a doubt whether the Consolidation Bill will get through, and, in case it does not, it would be much more satisfactory that this Act should be made intelligible to those who have to work it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): I will consider that. It might be possible so to amend the Bill as to make it a complete embodiment of the law on the subject. I do not know whether that would be within the functions of the Standing Committee as a mere Amendment, but at the same time it is worth while considering whether it cannot be sent down to the other House in the shape of a Consolidation Bill.

House in Committee accordingly.

Bill reported without Amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

NOTICE OF ACCIDENTS BILL.—(No. 106.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH said, he had a series of Amendments to move on this clause. They were all for the simple purpose of making the real intention of the promoters of the Bill clear and intelligible. The object was to make it quite clear that the days referred to should be working days, and not include Sundays or Bank holidays.

Amendments moved, in Sub-section (1), page 1, lines 7 and 8, leave out ("from returning to his work and doing five hours' work").

Line 9, before ("days") insert ("working"), and after ("accident") insert ("from being employed for five hours on his ordinary work").

Insert new Sub-section (3) :

" 3.) For the purpose of this section the expression 'working day' shall mean 'a day on which the person injured would, but for the injury, be employed in his ordinary work.'"

Clause 3, Sub-section (6), page 3, line 24, after (" it "), insert

("if it finds that the accident was due to the act or default or negligence of that person").—
(The Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

LORD PLAYFAIR, on behalf of the Government, accepted the proposed Amendments.

Amendments agreed to.

LORD PLAYFAIR moved, in Clause 3, page 3, line 21, after ("any") to insert ("costs and").

Line 24, after (" it ") to insert—

("and any such order shall, on the application of any person entitled to the benefit thereof, be enforced by any court of summary jurisdiction as if the costs and expenses were a penalty imposed by the court").

Line 25, after ("such") to insert ("costs and").

LORD ASHBOURNE desired to mention that he had received a letter from an influential medical authority stating certain Amendments which they wished to have made. They had, however, failed to send him the Amendments. He did not know whether the noble Lord had received and would insert them.

LORD PLAYFAIR said, the Amendments had been forwarded to him, and had they arrived at an earlier stage of the Bill they would have received full consideration; but the Board of Trade thought it was too late at the present advanced stage to adopt them.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH asked when it was intended to send the Bill to a Standing Committee?

LORD PLAYFAIR said, it would be either to-morrow or to-morrow week.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that was a very indefinite reply. The House could not know what went on in the private confabulations of the two noble Lords opposite. He hoped the noble Lord would state on which of those days it was to be.

LORD PLAYFAIR fixed the Standing Committee for to-morrow week.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed, as amended. (No. 130.)

ARBITRATION (SCOTLAND) BILL [H.L.]

past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 25th June 1894.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

EAST LONDON WATER BILL (by Order).

As amended, considered.

Ordered, That Standing Orders 223 and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the third time.—(Dr. Furquharson.)

Bill read the third time, and passed.

MR. A. GROVE (West Ham, N.) rose and said that he was desirous of moving sundry Amendments.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is out of Order. This Bill has already been read a third time. The Bill now before the House is the Newcastle and Gateshead Water Bill.

LONDON STREETS AND BUILDINGS BILL.

*SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) rose to move the following Notice:—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to deal with the appointment, control, and dismissal of district surveyors, fees and salaries of district surveyors, and generally the powers and duties of district surveyors, and any Amendments thereon submitted to the Committee."

He noticed that the Chairman of the Committee on the Bill had just come into the House. He (Sir C. Dilke) was not responsible for the exact terms of the Amendment, and he must say that for his own part he should not have imagined that there was any Instruction necessary. He supposed that his object could be accomplished without any Instruction.

*MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) said, he understood that this Instruction was moved because he had ruled certain Amendments out of Order. He did not think, however, that this Motion would enable them to deal with the question which they desired to raise. It seemed to him that any matter of the sort would be entirely without the scope of the Instruction.

SIR C. W. DILKE: I understand that the Chairman of the Committee stated that there was nothing in the Notice governing the case of district surveyors.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY said, he could not consent to be held too closely to the shorthand note of what he said; he could only be held to the actual decision he gave on the Amendment, the effect of which was that it would be to practically merge and abolish the office of district surveyor.

*SIR C. W. DILKE: Then I am to understand that that Amendment, which is an arrangement between the promoters of the other Amendment and the County Council, will be in Order?

MR. SPEAKER: The Instruction is couched in rather unusual language, and I am scarcely able to appreciate its full scope and meaning; but if it is intended to empower the Committee to deal with the appointment, control, and dismissal of district surveyors, the Committee has that power already, and has determined to deal with the question. Therefore, the Instruction will be unnecessary, and it is out of Order on that ground.

*SIR C. W. DILKE: As I have already said, I am not responsible for the form in which the Instruction is put on the Paper; but I am glad to hear what the Speaker has said, because it shows that the object I have in view has been accomplished without moving the Instruction. Under those circumstances, I am glad to be ruled out of Order, and will not proceed further in the matter.

QUESTIONS.

HIGHLAND RAILWAY TRAINS AND THE AUTOMATIC BRAKE.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the trains on the Highland Railway are so marshalled that the automatic brake is in action throughout that part of the train which conveys passengers; and, if not, whether he proposes to take steps to compel the Highland Railway Company to adopt such means as shall secure the maximum of safety to persons travelling on that line?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): I believe that certain trains on the Highland Railway are not yet marshalled in such a manner as to allow the automatic brake to be in motion throughout that part of the train which carries passengers. The Board of Trade are pressing the Company, and in the last resort may have to take proceedings against them under the powers of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1889.

ROADSIDE GRAZING RIGHTS.

MR. C. HOBHOUSE (Wilts, Devizes): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board in whom the right of grazing on the grass strips by the side of main and district roads vests; and what power the District Councils and Parish Councils will have over them under the Local Government Act of 1894?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. SHAW-LEFEBVRE, Bradford, Central): No general answer can be given to the question as to the right of grazing on the grass strips by the side of roads. In some cases it would attach to the owner of the soil, who prima facie would be the adjoining proprietor, and in other instances to the lord of the manor or to the surveyor of highways. In Local Board districts the right would usually attach to the Urban Sanitary Authority, with the exception that it would appear to attach to the County Council when the main road is vested in them. Under Section 26 of the Local Government Act it would be the duty of the District Council, on the representation of a Parish Council, to take proceedings to prevent any unlawful encroachment on any roadside waste within their district.

SLAVERY IN ZANZIBAR WATERS.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyne-side): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government has received any Report of a capture of a slave dhow in Zanzibar waters bound for Muscat, on or about the 13th of May last, by H.M.S. Philomel; and whether the liberation of the dhow after the condemnation of the slaves by Her Majesty's Vice Admiralty Court in Zanzibar, is not a breach of the provisions of the General Act of the Brussels Conference?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): A Report has been received, from which it appears that the Court was satisfied that there was no guilty knowledge on the part of the owner or the master. Under these circumstances, the release of the dhow was not in contravention of the spirit of the Brussels Act.

THE CONGO TREATY.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, as stated in Berlin telegrams, an agreement has been come to between the Governments of Great Britain and Germany with regard to the Congo Treaty; and, if so, whether he can inform the House what are the conditions of such Agreement?

SIR E. GREY: In compliance with the request of the King of the Belgians, Her Majesty's Government have signed an Agreement with him by which Article III. of the Agreement of May 12 is withdrawn.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: May I ask whether, under the new arrangements, British goods will have free transit over the territory with regard to which the article had been withdrawn; and whether it will still be open to Great Britain to erect a telegraph wire across that territory?

SIR E. GREY: Article III. has been withdrawn, but no new conditions have been made in doing so.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Was that not the case under the old Agreement?

*SIR E. GREY: If the hon. Member will give me notice I will give the information.

AFGHAN WAR PROMOTIONS.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Military Department at the India Office has been directed to the fact that officers on the General List of the Indian Army who were rewarded for their services in the Afghan War by the grant of brevet rank, will on their approaching promotion to the rank of Major General receive £419 a year, instead of £700, to which, had they not so distinguished themselves, they would have been entitled under the existing Regulations, and on being forced to retire will eventually lose £50 a year on their pension; whether there is any reason why officers should be thus penalised; and if it is possible to remedy this grievance?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The Colonels to whom the hon. Member's question relates were allowed to reside in England on £700 a year, while unemployed, until succession to the Colonel's allowance or promotion to Major General in consideration of their having lost their regimental appointments under the rules for the limitation of tenure introduced in 1882. This question was decided by Lord Cross in 1887, and I see no reason for dissenting from his view that there is not the same reason for this concession to Colonels promoted to be Major Generals who, whether their promotion had been accelerated by brevet or not, always vacated their regimental appointments on promotion to the latter rank, and then came under the rules and rates of pay applicable to their new grade. Officers on the General List promoted to be Major Generals are not forced to live in this country on £419 a year, or to retire. They can reside in India on Rs. 12,000 a year with the possibility of being selected for further employment; or they can retire on a pension of £700 a year after 32 years' service, or £750 after 38 years. I cannot admit that they have any grievance which calls for redress.

BENGAL JURY COMMISSION.

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the Report of the Indian Government on the recommendations of the Bengal Jury Commission has been received; whether it deals with the question of extending trial by jury in Bengal; and when it will be laid before the House?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I have ascertained that the views of all the local governments have reached the Government of India and are now under its consideration. It is probable that the Bengal letter has dealt with the question whether trial by jury should be extended in that Province; but, until I receive the Government of India's Report, I am unable to give a definite answer to my hon. Friend's question.

THE PETROLEUM ACTS.

MR. PAUL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can now say when he proposes to move the appointment of the Select Committee on the Petroleum Acts; who will be the Members of the Committee; and what will be the terms of the Reference?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): My hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury hopes to move the appointment of this Committee in the course of the present week. The names and the terms of Reference will appear on the Paper in a day or two.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN THE COOTEHILL UNION.

MR. YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that several applications have been made to the Local Government Board over two months ago for an inquiry under Section 4 of "The Labourers' Act, 1871," in respect of certain representations for cottages in the Tullyvin Dispensary District of Cootehill Union, on which the Guardians have refused to act; whether all the formalities have been complied with; and whether the Local Government Board propose to order an inquiry; and, if so, when?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The applications referred to were received by the Local Government Board six weeks ago, and they have since been in communication with the Guardians on the subject. It may possibly be necessary to order an inquiry under the section of the Act mentioned, but the date of such inquiry, if ordered, will depend upon the other and prior engagements of the Inspector for the district.

METROPOLITAN POLICE COURT ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the public inconvenience, which he admitted on the 20th of November, 1898,

Sir Seymour King

was then arising from the state of business in the Metropolitan Police Courts, still continues; and when he will give effect to the re-arrangement of areas and of business which he then proposed to carry out?

MR. ASQUITH: The matter has not been lost sight of, but there are difficulties, and I can only say that I appreciate the inconvenience referred to, and am doing my best to see how far they may be instigated by some re-arrangement.

TREATMENT OF CHILDREN IN POOR LAW SCHOOLS.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the conviction of Nurse Gillespie, of the Hackney Union schools at Brentwood, of gross cruelty to the children under her care; whether he will direct an inquiry to be made as to the conduct of workhouse schools generally, and the after effect on the children of workhouse training; and whether, in view of the well-known paper taint of such children, he will issue a Circular to Boards of Guardians recommending boarding out and emigration wherever possible?

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): At the same time I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in view of the recent disclosures at the Forest Gate and Brentwood schools, he will consent to a public inquiry by a Committee of the House of Commons or by a Commission, as to how far it is possible for the Local Authorities to ensure the health and humane treatment of children in large barrack schools; and whether it would not be better to substitute a system of boarding out children in the families of workers or providing for them in cottage homes, where the spread of infectious disease and inhuman treatment could be more effectively checked?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: As I have previously stated, my attention has been called to the conviction of Nurse Gillespie at the schools of the Hackney Union at Brentwood, and I have determined that there shall be a full investigation into the management of the schools. The inquiry will be a public one, and the evidence will be taken on oath. With regard to the question as to a general inquiry by a Committee of the House of Commons or by a Commission, the subject will receive my consideration, but I will defer any decision until after the inquiry which I propose should now be held in the case of the Hackney schools. As to the questions which are raised with regard to the boarding out of children or providing for their emigration, I must point out that in the case of a very large proportion of the children in these schools neither of these systems would be available; but every facility is afforded to Guardians by the Local Government Board for the adoption of either plan.

KILLARNEY POOR LAW UNION.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state for what period the Vice Guardians placed in charge of the Killarney Poor Law Union have been appointed; and whether any arrears of rent on labourers' cottages were due when the Board of Guardians was dissolved?

MR. J. MORLEY: Section 26 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 56 provides that unless the Local Government Board shall sooner revoke or determine the appointment of paid officers appointed in lieu of a Board of Guardians, they shall hold their offices for the term of one year from the date of their appointment, and thenceforth till the time of the next election of Guardians for such Union and no longer. Thus the Vice Guardians of Killarney Union can remain in office until March 25, 1896, unless it be found expedient to reinstate the Board of Guardians before that date. The clerk of the Union states that the amount of arrears of rent on labourers' cottages due when the Board of Guardians was dissolved was £417.

LISTOWEL UNION RATES.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the total rate struck by the Listowel Board of Guardians in the years 1880 and 1893, the amount per £1 in both years payable by the ratepayers, and the number of the holdings in the Union under £4 valuation in which the whole rate is paid by the landlord?

MR. J. MORLEY: The clerk of the Listowel Union reports that the total rate struck by the Guardians of the Union in the year 1880 was £3,455, and in 1893, £9,274 in the new Union, i.e., the Union as enlarged by the addition of part of Glin Union in 1891. The amount per £1 payable by the ratepayers in 1880 was 1s. 3½d. In 1893 the average poundage was 2s. 8½d. The number of holdings in the Union under £4 in which the whole rate is payable by the landlord is 2,987.

NEWCASTLE HARBOUR.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the last annual Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, from which it appears that during the year 14,801 cwt. of herrings were caught in the Ardglass district and 13,849 cwt. in the Kilkeel district; whether he is aware that Newcastle is situate midway between Kilkeel and Ardglass, and that during the same year upwards of 263 tons of fish (exclusive of mackerel and herrings) were forwarded from Newcastle by the Belfast and County Down Railway alone; whether Mr. Roughton, the Inspecting Lieutenant, has reported that the harbour at Newcastle remains in the deplorably useless state so often reported; and whether, considering the number of lives already lost there, the great danger to the poor fishermen, and the loss to the country by reason of the want of safe and requisite harbour accommodation at Newcastle, he will now send an Inspector to the place with the view of reporting what can be done to lessen the danger to which these fishermen are at present constantly exposed?

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): May I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to give this question serious consideration? It is a matter of vast importance to these fishermen.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): I have seen the Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries referred to, but I am afraid that it does not enable me to vary the answer which I have more than once given, to the effect that there are no funds available for the purpose of improving the accommodation at Newcastle, and it could only give rise to unfounded hopes to send a Board of Works engineer to inspect the harbour. The matter appears to be one for the consideration of the County Authorities.

MR. M'CARTAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman send an Inspector to the place?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: It is the duty of the County Authorities first to move in this matter.

MR. M'CARTAN: Is it a fact that this place has been neglected by successive Governments; and if the right hon. Gentleman himself visited the district, will there be any chance of its receiving some attention?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, that the practice of the Treasury was to consult the Board of Works in such matters.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): Yes; but will any money be sent to assist these people, who have been "stuck" over this pier already?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am not aware that they have been "stuck" over it.

MR. M'CARTAN: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in the beginning the ratepayers were obliged to take up the building of this work without having any voice in the administration of it?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT said, he was not aware.

MR. M'CARTAN: Is there any chance of the right hon. Gentleman himself visiting the place?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I have already visited parts in the North and South of Ireland; and if an opportunity is given me by the Government remaining in Office, I shall be very happy to visit it next year.

MR. W. JOHNSTON: May I tell the hon. Gentleman that it is not far from Ballykilbeg, and I shall be very glad to see him there.

TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT INQUIRY.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the Departmental Committee inquiring into the Telegraph Department have presented their Report, and whether he can say what proposals, if any, have been made respecting the grievances of the staff, which he announced would be inquired into?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): On the 3rd of April, in reply to the hon. Member, I stated that the Committee in question, which was mainly intended to inquire into the possibility of introducing economy into the Service, would report for the information and guidance of the Department, and that it was, consequently, not certain that their Report would be one which could properly be laid before Parliament. As I stated, in reply to a question of the 15th of June, I have made a large addition to the staff at the Central Telegraph Office, which has had the effect of improving the position and prospects of the staff employed, and has considerably lessened the necessity for overtime work. I am carefully considering the recommendations of the Committee, and taking steps to give effect to most of them.

THE TRANSVAAL MINING INDUSTRY.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that various patents for processes for the extraction of precious metals from their ores, in which processes cyanide of potassium plays an important part, have been granted to British subjects by the Transvaal Government, that a monopoly is proposed to be granted by the Transvaal Government for the importation of cyanide of potassium, which will practically prevent the legitimate use of such processes, whereby great loss will be incurred by the patentees; and whether he will make a representation to the Transvaal Government to obtain protection for such patentees?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. Buxton, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I stated on Thursday, in answer to a question by the hon. Member for Cambridge, that the matter appeared to be one of importance, and that if any representation were made to us that we would consider what action could be taken in regard to it. I have since received the information in question, and we are now in communication with the High Commissioner on the subject.

MR. BARTLEY: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that very high patent fees are charged for the right of working in the Transvaal? Is not that a serious consideration?

MR. S. BUXTON: All such matters will be taken into consideration.

EX-NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHER, P. M'TEIGNE.

MR. TULLY (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a Memorial signed by the priests, Poor Law Guardians, merchants, and others in the district of Ballinamore, South Leitrim, on behalf of Mrs. Margaret M'Teigne, of Mayo, Ballinamore, whose husband, Patrick M'Teigne, was teacher of Drumbibe National School, and died on the 29th of February, 1894, stating that previous to his death an award of £92, retiring allowance, had been made by the Commissioners of National Education, and the same notified to the manager of the school, the Very Rev. D. M'Breen, P.P., Ballinamore; that the said allowance has been so far withheld from the widow of this teacher; and whether he is prepared to recommend that under the circumstances the amount be paid over to her without further delay?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have received the Memorial referred to in the question. The case has already received my consideration in connection with a communication which I received from the hon. Gentleman in March last, and I regret that I can now only repeat the answer to that communication—namely, that the Regulations strictly preclude the payment to the widow of the gratuity which would have been payable to her husband had he lived.

CLOGHER PETTY SESSIONAL BENCH.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. A. M'Laren, of Augher, County Tyrone, recently appointed to the Commission of the Peace for that county, in filling up the usual papers for the information of the Lord Chancellor, made known the fact that he was the holder of a retail licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and is he aware that, on the first day Mr. M'Laren sat at Clogher Petty Sessions as a Justice, an application for a transfer of his licence was made in the name of his shop assistant; whether the Lord Chancellor is satisfied that the transfer is bonâ fide; and if the transferee is a householder, as required by the Licensing Acts?

MR. J. MORLEY : Mr. M'Laren did not, in filling up his paper for the Lord Chancellor, describe himself as a publican. He described himself as a draper, grocer, and farmer. He had previously—on May 12, 1894—transferred his interest in the public-house and premises to a man named Smiton. That instrument of transfer was examined by the Lord Chancellor before the appointment was sanctioned, and the Lord Chancellor was satisfied that the transfer was bonâ fide. Subsequent careful inquiries have confirmed him in this belief, and also that Mr. M'Laren will henceforth have no interests in the profits of the business or its management. Mr. M'Laren did act as a Magistrate at Clogher Petty Sessions for the first time on June 12, but he did not sit on the Bench when the application for a transfer was made. He did not vote for the transfer or take any part in the proceedings in this case. The transferee is, I am informed, a householder. It will be for the Magistrates at Quarter Sessions to satisfy themselves on this point when the confirmation of the transfer is sought for.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) : I shall call attention to this matter on the Estimates.

COMMANDEERING IN THE TRANSVAAL.

MR. DARLING (Deptford) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the South African Republic has lately violated Article 15 of the Convention concluded on the 27th of February, 1884, between Her Majesty and the South African Republic; whether, at the time of concluding such Convention, Her Majesty was Suzerain of the Transvaal; whether under that Convention British subjects are liable to military service under a foreign Republic; and whether the subjects of other Sovereigns than Her Majesty are by Treaty excused from such service?

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is correct, as stated in the telegrams from South Africa, that British subjects in the Transvaal have within the last few days been forcibly commandeered and sent in prison waggons to fight in the Boer Army; and, if so, what action Her Majesty's Government propose to take?

At the same time, I will also ask the hon. Gentleman if he can inform the House as to the reply given by the Transvaal Government to the protest made by Her Majesty's Government against the commandeering of British subjects for military service in the Transvaal?

MR. S. BUXTON : Sir H. Loch arrives to-day at Pretoria, and will at once enter into communication with President Krüger in regard to the question of commandeering. Meanwhile, I should prefer not to make any statement on the subject.

MR. DARLING : I did not ask the hon. Gentleman a question at all. I put it to another Minister, the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and I should be obliged if he will answer it. It is of some importance. It would have been raised on Friday night, only there were so few Members of the Government present.

MR. S. BUXTON : The question is quite capable of being answered, but four parts of it refer to matters now a subject of negotiation between Her Majesty's Government and the Transvaal Government, and it might be a disadvantage to answer at the present time.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) : Is it not invariably the case that any questions put from these Benches with regard to the Transvaal are always replied to in the same way—that they deal with matters under negotiation?

MR. SPEAKER : Order, Order!

Subsequently—

MR. DARLING said : I desire to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if they can inform the House whether Her Majesty is or is not at the present time Suzerain of the Transvaal?

SIR W. HARCOURT : That is a question of which notice ought to be given.

MR. DARLING : The question appears on the Paper.

SIR W. HARCOURT : I am told the hon. Member has already been informed by the Under Secretary for the Colonies that it is inexpedient at the present time to make any statement.

MR. DARLING : I did not understand that that referred to the question as to the suzerainty. I took it as having regard only to the subject of commandeering.

REMUNERATION OF MEDICAL WITNESSES AT IRISH ASSIZES.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if, in view of the approaching Irish Assizes, having regard to the repeated complaints of the insufficiency of the scale of remuneration allowed to medical witnesses at criminal trials in Ireland, he will advise a reconsideration of the subject by the proper Department?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have made inquiry into this matter, and have examined the scales of fees payable to medical witnesses at criminal trials in England and Ireland respectively. The scale of fees payable to such witnesses in Ireland is already much in excess of that in force in this country, and I cannot, therefore, advise the Treasury to sanction a revision of the payments with a view to any increase on the existing scale.

METROPOLITAN POLICE BOOTS.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will cause an immediate and independent inquiry to be made in order to ascertain whether the statement that considerable dissatisfaction prevails amongst the constables of the Metropolitan Police Force as to the quality and comfort of the boots supplied to them is true, or otherwise? At the same time, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman the name of the firm or firms now holding the contract for the boots supplied to the constables of the Metropolitan Police?

MR. ASQUITH: I cannot consent to any such inquiry (i.e., as to alleged dissatisfaction among the Metropolitan Police as to the quality and comfort of their boots), which would be altogether inconsistent with the discipline and good government of the Force. Any complaints which the men have they can make to their officers, as they well know, and the most considerate attention is always given to any representations so put forward. I may add that, as the existing contract has nearly three years to run, any immediate change in the system, even if it proved to be desirable, would be impracticable. There are two contractors—Messrs. J. & E. Reynolds and Messrs. Pocock Brothers — who supply the Force with boots.

THE ACHILL ISLANDERS.

DR. R. AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that 20 poor people, residents of Achill Island, and most of them survivors of the late boating disaster in Clew Bay, were recently summoned by the agent of the Pike Estate in Achill Island for picking some heath off the wild mountain for the purpose of making brooms; that three of them were fined 1d. each, and that the Magistrate dismissed the case against the remaining 17; and whether, in view of the fact that these people pay for the grazing of the mountain, and that many of them are too ill after the boating disaster to proceed to England and Scotland to earn money to pay their rent, he can take any steps to prevent a recurrence of such prosecutions?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that some 22 persons were summoned for trespass to the last Achill Petty Sessions, held on the 15th instant, by the agent of the Pike Estate in Achill Island. Seven of the summonses were withdrawn, as it was shown that some of the defendants had been drowned in the recent disaster, and that others were away at Westport. In the remaining 15 cases fines of 6d. each and costs were imposed, and amongst this number were three of the survivors from the accident. The District Inspector of Constabulary informs me that it is not the fact that the people pay grazing for the lands on which they were found trespassing. I need hardly add that these proceedings were not at the suit of the police, and that the Crown have no means of interfering in any way with private prosecutions.

DR. R. AMBROSE: Cannot something be done to restore the cattle taken from these poor people and sold to pay the forgo, seeing sheep were sold at 2d. each, and cattle at 1s.?

MR. J. MORLEY: I do not know whether there are any legal powers of interference, but I will inquire.

THE LURGAN DISTURBANCES.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now give any further particulars as to the disposition of the police in Lurgan on the 10th instant, when the Rev. William M'Cartan on his way home was beaten and wounded in one of the streets?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have not yet arrived at a decision in this matter. Very probably I shall require to be furnished with additional information to that now in my possession, and some time must necessarily elapse before a final decision can be arrived at.

COUNTY TYRONE MAGISTERIAL BENCH.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Lord Ashbourne, when Lord Chancellor of Ireland, appointed John G. Porter and John S. Gervan, both hotel proprietors, holding retail licences, to be Justices of the Peace for the County of Tyrone; and whether numerous other appointments of holders of retail licences were made under the late Administration?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that the two gentlemen named in the question were appointed to the Commission of the Peace by the late Lord Chancellor, but that at the time of their appointments they were proprietors of "temperance" hotels. There were three proprietors of hotels holding publicans' licences placed in the County Commission, and also seven gentlemen holding similar licences placed in the Borough Commission, during the term of the late Government. In none of these cases were the persons appointed required to transfer their licences, nor was any such condition attached to their appointment.

MR. BODKIN (Roscommon, N.): Was any gentleman holding a temperance hotel licence in the County of Dublin appointed to the Commission of the Peace by the late Government?

CLOGHER PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Captain Ferrall and his son, Captain Ferrall, Magistrates of Tyrone, sat together and voted at the Clogher Petty Sessions on the 12th instant; whether this was against rule, and contrary to the engagement entered into by Mr. J. C. Ferrall on his appointment to the Commission; and what notice will be taken of the matter by the Lord Chancellor?

MR. J. MORLEY: The fact is as stated in the first paragraph. The question of father and son voting together at an election of Petty Sessions Clerks was submitted to Lord Chancellor Ball in the year 1875, and he decided that they could do so. Consequently, the gentlemen named in my hon. Friend's question are protected by this decision in their action on the occasion referred to.

MR. SEXTON: Might I ask whether it is true that Mr. J. C. Ferrall, when receiving his appointment to the Commission of the Peace, undertook not to vote at the same time as his father?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have no information on this point, but I may point out that this, of course, is a matter apparently for the exercise of good taste and discretion on the part of the persons themselves.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Does this not equally apply to a father voting for his son's appointment as Petty Sessions Clerk?

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to inquire from the Lord Chancellor whether Mr. J. C. Ferrall, on receiving his appointment, promised not to vote at the same time as his father?

MR. J. MORLEY: I shall certainly make inquiries.

TRACERS IN THE POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE (West Ham, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General will he explain why two senior second-class tracers were recently passed over when filling vacancies in the first class; whether these men are now performing duties the same as those performed by first-class men; whether these same men have been passed over on previous occasions; whether he is aware that great dissatisfaction exists among the tracers' staff at the way promotions are made; and whether he intends to take steps to allay the dissatisfaction?

MR. A. MORLEY: When I made the promotions in April last, I very carefully considered the qualifications of the two officers referred to. One of them had been tried on first-class duties, but at his own request was put back upon second-class duties, and I did not think it right to give him the promotion. Since then he has expressed a wish to be tried again upon first-class duties, and is being tried accordingly. As regards the other officer, I have never been altogether satisfied with his conduct, and until he has proved himself to be more reliable I cannot promote him.

PETERHEAD PRISON.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that the warders in Peterhead Prison are on duty on an average 62½ hours per week ; and whether, in view of the fact that the discipline is very rigid and the duties fatiguing, he will consider the desirability of putting the men on a 48-hour week ?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton) : In reply to the hon. Member, I am informed by the Prison Commissioners : (1st) that the present hours of duty for warders at Peterhead are on an average 61 hours and 35 minutes weekly ; but taking into consideration the shorter hours in winter, when the weekly average is 57 hours and 20 minutes, the average over the whole year is 59½ hours ; (2) that a somewhat stricter discipline can be maintained at Peterhead, where the staff is stronger and better paid than in other Scottish prison ; (3) that the Commissioners do not consider that the duties of the warders at Peterhead are more fatiguing than in a close prison—probably they are less so. The question of hours of warders, in relation to the duties they have to perform, is one which would have to be considered in communication with the Home Department.

INCOME TAX VALUATION.

MR. BRUNNER : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury on what basis the Income Tax valuation under Schedule A is calculated, and what proportion it bears to the Poor Rate assessment ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The assessment to Income Tax (Schedule A) is on the gross annual value or rack-rent. The proportion which it bears to the rateable value varies very considerably, according to the nature of the property as well as according to the locality.

MINERAL RIGHTS IN WALES.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydfil) : I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been called to the fact of the recent discovery of the original grant made by Edward VI. to Sir William Herbert of certain manors and estates in South Wales ; whether in this grant the minerals are reserved to the Crown ; whether the original grant included several manors in which extensive coal and minerals have been and are being worked ; whether the title of the Crown to the said minerals is still good ; and whether the Crown can claim against the persons who have worked them in respect of the past issues and profits of the minerals ?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar) : My attention has not been called to the grant mentioned in the question, but I have ascertained that some such grant has been found dated, I believe, 1551. I am informed that it is not the fact that in that grant there is any reservation whatever of minerals to the Crown.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint, &c.) : May I ask whether the particulars relating to the grant have been investigated, and, if not, whether they will be, with the view of ascertaining whether there is any reservation of mines or minerals ?

SIR J. RIGBY : I am told that some idea had got abroad that the particulars did not correspond with the grant, but that this is altogether without basis. Investigations have been made, and there is no irregularity or difference whatever.

THE REVISION OF LONG SENTENCES.

MR. HOPWOOD (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether inquiry is made from time to time into the cases of prisoners (unaided or forgotten by friends) under long sentences which appear to be disproportionate to the offence ; whether the government intend that the Home Office review every case has any foundation in fact, and whether in the interval until the Court of Appeal and Revision of Sentences, suggested by Her Majesty's Judges, can be established by law, he will direct such cases as the above to be brought to him for consideration, either with the aid of the presiding Judge or by his own judgment?

MR. ASQUITH: I do not understand what is meant by the words "long sentences which appear to be disproportionate to the offence"; but, taking the question to mean whether all long sentences are revised, I may say it is a rule of the Home Office that all long sentence cases, both male and female, are brought under the review of the Secretary of State at 10 years, 15 years, and 20 years, and inquiry into the circumstances then made either by consulting the Judge or otherwise, as he may deem advisable. All cases of women under sentence of penal servitude for life are brought under consideration at the earlier period of seven years, as well as at the terms before mentioned. This consideration at stated intervals of long sentence cases is in addition to, and apart from, any application made either by the prisoners themselves or by others on their behalf, and by no means implies interference, but ensures that no very long term of penal servitude is endured by a prisoner without the circumstances of his case being duly and periodically considered.

THE VOLUNTEER DECORATION.

SIR C. DALRYMPLE (Ipswich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will, in regard to the decoration about to be issued, consider the claims of old Volunteers whose record is undoubted and can be vouched for by the Adjutant of the regiment on the recommendation of the Commanding Officer?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): I can only repeat that I do not see my way to make the grant of this medal retrospective to Volunteers who had ceased to serve before 1893 for reasons I have more than once stated.

THE CHANNEL FLEET.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): Can the Secretary to the Admiralty state whether the Channel Fleet is, and has been for the past few days, at Stornoway?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): I cannot answer that question without notice.

Mr. Hopwood

ASSASSINATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I beg to give notice that to-morrow I will move an Address for the purpose of expressing the sentiments of the House on the assassination of the President of the French Republic. It will be in the following terms:—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to convey to Her Majesty the expression of the deep sorrow and indignation with which this House has learned the assassination of the President of the French Republic, and to pray Her Majesty that in communicating her own sentiments on this deplorable event to the French Government Her Majesty will also be graciously pleased to express on the part of this House their abhorrence of the crime and their sympathy with the Government and people of France."

THE ROYAL BIRTH.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I also give notice that on Thursday I will move an Address to Her Majesty on the birth of a son to the Duke of York.

THE COLLIERY EXPLOSION IN WALES.

MR. ABEL THOMAS (Carmarthen, E.): Can the Home Secretary give the House any recent information as to the number of lives lost in the colliery explosion in Wales?

MR. ASQUITH: I regret I am not in a position to give the House any further information than is contained in the newspapers as to this deplorable event, which I believe exceeds in magnitude any of which we have had experience in recent years. Very careful investigations are being made by the Inspector on the spot. Most gallant efforts were made to save and preserve life. There is reason to believe that the loss of life will exceed 250 persons.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE: Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in moving the Address, embody an expression of the sympathy of the House with the relatives of those who have been killed by the explosion?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am sure that the House will only be too happy to express its sympathy with the sufferers by this explosion, but I do not think that that will form part of an Address.

The feeling of the House is unanimous upon the subject. I am sure that without any delay I may at once, so far as I am able to do so, make myself the mouth-piece now of hon. Members and give expression to their sympathy and regret.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): Will Supply be taken on Wednesday?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Not as I am at present advised. If an alteration be made I will let the House have notice of it. I am distinctly hopeful that we may get through the Committee stage of the Budget Bill in the present week, and in that hope we shall proceed with it on Wednesday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.—(No. 190.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 22nd June.]

[EIGHTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 16 stand part of the Bill."

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, that on Friday night the hon. Member for the Kingston Division of Surrey inquired as to the effect of Clause 16 on grants from Imperial funds towards local taxation. So far as the amount of the grant was concerned, no doubt it would be the same in the future. But the point was as to from what fund the subventions were to be paid in the future, for it made all the difference whether they were to be paid by personalty or by realty. If any portion came from realty it would practically be no subvention from Imperial funds. What had been the history of these grants from Imperial funds in aid of local taxation? The grants were originally made because local rates were levied on realty; it was on that account the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the year 1888, gave one-half the proceeds of Probate Duty in relief of local taxation as a subvention to be paid by personalty. Thus for all Imperial purposes one-half the Probate Duty disappeared from Imperial taxation, and it was evidently the intention of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer that these subventions from Imperial funds in aid of local taxation should be paid by personalty. But the late Chancellor of the Exchequer went further, and said that by the increase of Succession Duty equal taxes would be levied on all kinds of property for Imperial purposes, and that the contribution from Probate Duty would be an additional tax upon personalty with the sole object of relieving local taxation. Personalty and realty were intended by the right hon. Gentleman to contribute in equal and fair proportion towards Imperial purposes, and an additional £1,000,000 raised on personalty in order to provide the subvention in aid of local taxation. But under the Bill personalty, instead of paying £1,000,000, would only pay £750,000, so that realty would be contributing £250,000. Previously personalty paid the whole £1,000,000. To this extent, therefore, personalty was eased. Surely that was not the intention of the right hon. Gentleman? Personalty ought to continue to pay as much in the future as it had in the past, and they ought not now to propose simply to relieve realty at its own expense, and to let personalty off to the extent of £250,000.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he did not think the clause was open to the objection raised by the hon. Member. He could best illustrate the case by suggesting that there were three contributory streams which ultimately became one stream. They took from the main stream the same amount as at present was obtained from the contributory, or in other words the probate stream, and he thought they had acted for the best.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had accurately followed out his simile. The Government had not taken from the main stream, but were drawing from a private brook belonging exclusively to the millowner—or the owner of realty. The fact was, that in the future the grants in aid of local taxation which had hitherto been paid by personalty alone would under this clause have to be contributed to by realty.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) thought the complaints of the hon. Member for Preston were perfectly well founded, and that real property would gradually acquire a burden from which it was free at the present time. Could not the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer make it clear by the Bill that these grants in aid of local taxation should in the future as in the past be deemed to be paid out of funds contributed by personalty?

MR. BARTLEY, while holding that these grants were dangerous in principle and led to extravagance in local administration, agreed with the hon. Member for Preston that they were running the risk under this clause of converting into a mixed fund money which had hitherto been contributed by one class of property alone.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, the point really was whether justice was being done to the land and real property in this matter? He greatly feared that the illustration given by the right hon. Gentleman as to different streams was one which really darkened counsel, and misled the judgment. There might have been some force in the metaphor if the stream had not already belonged to the recipient of the fund. It had been proved by his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) that, supposing the amount received by the landed interest was £1,000,000, under the arrangement made by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) the subvention would be now reduced to £750,000. Therefore, the subvention was being reduced to the extent of £250,000, and, pro tanto, one more burden was being placed upon the already overburdened interest of real property. To this extent real property was being subjected to an additional tax.

MR. HANBURY said, he wished to state very shortly his objection to the clause. As he understood the grant of the Probate Duty in aid of local taxation, it was a grant of an additional tax after the Chancellor of the Exchequer had fairly distributed the Imperial taxes between realty and personalty. He (Mr. Hanbury) would assume that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to-day doing exactly the same thing as the late Chancellor had done. The right hon. Gentleman had, according to his view, apportioned the Imperial taxes fairly between realty and personalty, but he had levied a tax which was to go in aid of local taxation, and, instead of levying the tax upon personalty alone, he was levying it upon a fund which was contributed to in certain proportions by realty and personalty alike.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 17.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk) moved to leave out the words "a deceased" before "person" in line 28, and to insert the word "any." He said, "the death of a deceased person" appeared to be a very strange phrase. He did not believe that the Bill was intended to apply to what theologians called the second death. He thought what was meant was the death not of a dead person, but of a living person. The Amendment was intended to prevent rather an outrage upon the English language.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 28, to leave out the words "a deceased," and insert the word "any."—(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR W. HARCOURT: It seems to me that the Amendment is unnecessary.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, the language used in the clause was somewhat tautological, and was certainly bad English as it stood.

Question put, and agreed to.

*SIR S. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) moved to insert, after "respect" in line 28, the words "of any property bequeathed as a free gift to the Nation, or in respect." He said, he thought this proposal supplied an omission in the Bill, and he trusted the Government would accept it. As the measure now stood, anyone leaving a picture to the National Gallery of the value of £10,000 must provide for the payment of the graduated Death Duty, which might amount to a maximum of £800. This was likely to discourage anyone likely to make a bequest. There might be an extreme case of a man who enjoyed an income which would terminate with his life employing all his surplus funds in collecting works of art to leave as a complete collection to the nation. Unless some such Amendment as this were adopted the nation would lose a bequest made by such a man because there would be no funds wherewith to pay the Death Duties. This would be worse than looking a gift horse in the mouth. It would be taking the gift horse and insisting that the donor should also make a present of the saddle or bridle. The Government had waived the Probate Duty on two or three bequests on former occasions, and it would be well to make the exemption general.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 28, after the word "respect," to insert the words "of any property bequeathed as a free gift to the Nation, or in respect."—(Sir S. Montagu.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I thoroughly accept the principle of this Amendment. In point of fact, I had considered this matter with Mr. Tate in connection with his magnificent gifts to the country. He requested that it should be arranged that no Death Duties should be charged on his pictures. My hon. Friend is quite right in saying that there have been previous instances in which the duty has been waived. There was the case of Mr. Wynne Ellis, who died in 1875 and bequeathed to the National Gallery a number of pictures. Then there was the case of Mr. Henderson, who died in 1878 and left various curiosities to the British Museum and a collection of water colours to the National Gallery. In these cases the duty was paid, but was returned. There was also the case of Mr. Octavius Morgan in 1878. I would, however, suggest to my hon. Friend that this is not exactly the place in which to insert this provision. It should come earlier in the Bill. We will take care that it shall be put in. The Amendment will need some little alteration also. It must be made to relate not to property bequeathed, but to property accepted by the nation. Sometimes people have a higher idea of the value of their works of art than is entertained by others.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman also consider the case of bequests to local Museums? The principle is to a certain extent the same as in the case of bequests to the nation.

SIR W. HARCOURT was understood to say that he would consider that case.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): I would suggest that bequests to Municipalities should be exempted in the same way.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not accept that suggestion. I do not see why Municipalities should be benefited at the expense of the taxpayers.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he hoped that Members would not impose too much upon the good nature of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He could quite understand the reason why the nation should not exact the duty in the case of a gift to itself, but to say that Local Bodies to which sums of money were left should have their gifts exempted from taxation appeared to him to be going too far. He was afraid that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer adopted the suggestions of the right hon. Members for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and Ormskirk (Mr. Forwood), he would be tempted to go still further, and it would be urged that no money left to a charity of any sort or kind should be subjected to taxation.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am sorry to say that I think that is so now.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman was in error over that point.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman will remember the great contest with my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) when he endeavoured to tax charities.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that was in respect of income. If his recollection served him aright, he thought that, as far as Legacy Duty was concerned, charities had not only to pay at the same rate as ordinary persons who inherited property, but were placed under the extreme scale of 10 per cent., which was the highest known to the law. He would warn the Chancellor of the Exchequer that unless he adopted a firm attitude on this question he would find the appeals which were made to him would be carried to a dangerous extent.

SIR A. ROLLIT said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take a wider view of the question than one of pounds, shillings, and pence. The principle which ought to be adopted was that bequests for public purposes should be encouraged. What, after all, was the distinction between a bequest to a Municipality and one to the nation? Gifts to a Municipality were really gifts to the whole nation. He thought that, so far from restricting the principle of recognising gifts for public purposes, it ought to be applied to the cases of Municipalities and County Councils, which were representatives of the community.

SIR S. MONTAGU said that, after what had fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would withdraw the Amendment.

*SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle) said, he entirely dissented from the doctrine of remission of taxation for any of the objects mentioned. Such a doctrine he regarded as a very dangerous one. If a man wanted his pictures to go to the nation and did not wish to pay duty upon the gifts, he could easily give them during his lifetime. If gifts of pictures and works of art were to be exempted from the duty, why should not also public parks when given to a particular district be exempted?

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: I entirely agree with what has been so well said by the hon. Baronet who has just sat down, and I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will leave this matter in its present condition.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I entirely disagree with what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) and the hon. Gentleman who preceded him. I must warn the Chancellor of the Exchequer that if there were any attempt to grant a special exemption in the case of property left to the nation while refusing to grant it to property left to Municipalities, the representatives of Municipalities on both sides of this House would have a great deal to say to it. I think the principle is exactly the same in either of these two cases. It is really no good saying that the remedy is that these gifts should be made during the lifetime of the giver. It is not the person whom we want to punish; we are really punishing ourselves. Is it better that the nation should remit one-tenth of the value of the property or lose the property altogether? The point is that we want to tempt and induce and stimulate people to make these gifts to the representatives of the community, and if they are prevented from making them by the severity with which they are treated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that would not be an economical proceeding for the nation to adopt. I think the right hon. Gentleman should at least be aware that on that point there is a very strong feeling indeed, and I am sure that he will get into difficulty at a later stage if the concession he has so gracefully made should not be extended to the representatives of the Municipalities.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman opposite that the same measure ought to be meted out to Municipalities as was meted out to the nation itself. In fact, he agreed with those who held the doctrine that all property ought to be equally dealt with. He did not hesitate to say that, in too many instances, these bequests to public objects had not been due to feelings which would receive the greatest amount of sympathy from the public. He remembered the late Prime Minister once saying that the great mass of these bequests were made out of spite, and, for his own part, he could not refrain from cordially agreeing with him.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Some bequests are made from motives of ostentation.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer very properly added "and for motives of ostentation." The late Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had very happily hit off the exact state of affairs. The man who left his money in the ordinary natural course to those who might legitimately look forward to succeeding him at his death should not be treated differently to the man who left his money to some public or quasi-public purpose—it might be, for the purpose of punishing his relatives. If the Metropolis were to be treated exceptionally in the matter of national objects jealousy would arise. Difficulty would arise unless they stuck to the one rule, that all property should be treated alike.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, the view of the right hon. Gentleman below him (Mr. J. Lowther) was a sound one. The proposal was made that property left to the nation should be exempt from taxation. That was objected to on the ground that such property would generally be in London. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) said that if they made this exemption in the case of property given to the nation they should do exactly the same thing in the case of property presented to the Municipalities. But they would not be able to stop there. Why should not the villages surrounding Birmingham also have this exemption? If exemption were given it should be applicable in all cases.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, it was very refreshing to hear gentlemen speaking in defence of the Revenue. That was a state of things to which, so far, he had not been accustomed during the progress of the Bill. But there was great divergence of opinion between hon. Gentlemen on either side of the House—such a divergence that they might almost leave the artillerymen to fire their cannon into one another's mouths. He admitted that there would be danger in the extension of the principle of exemption in reference to gifts to national collections, and he would consider how far they should impose a limit. It was said of a great nation of old that it was distinguished for the magnificence of its public buildings and the modesty of its private houses. In that spirit they should deal with gifts made for the use of the public.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan), said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would continue in a yielding mood and listen to the suggestions made from various quarters of the House. These gifts to the public were of the greatest value. In the borough which he represented there was a Free Library which had been furnished on bequest with books to the value of £20,000, to the great benefit of Wigan and the surrounding districts of Lancashire. He protested against the assertion that these gifts were made from motives of ostentation. He did not say that there was no case where that element came in, but he did say that in the main these gifts arose from a desire to serve the community. The community ought to be grateful, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to encourage such gifts in every way.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he would remind the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or, in his absence, the Solicitor General, that the principle of exemptions of this kind already existed. All books, prints, pictures, statues, gems, coins, medals, specimens of natural history, and all other articles of the kind given to any Body Corporate or Society or endowed school, to be kept and preserved, were already exempt under the Legacy Duty Act. Therefore, the principle of exemption had already been accepted. There were other exemptions—a wife or a husband and members of the Royal Family. The subject of exemptions should be dealt with on principle. Exemptions should be dealt with in a clause by themselves, to be moved, like a thousand other clauses, on Report. He understood the Solicitor General or his lieutenant, the Chancellor of the Exchequer—[laughter—]to say that that was a course that was going to be followed—because the question of exemptions had been raised before. All he desired was that the exemptions should be considered altogether. There were important exemptions in the present law. If they were going to continue them, well and good. If they were going to get rid of some of them he should say, "Get rid of the others too." These exemptions should be considered all together, and on some principle—if the Government were capable of entertaining such a thing as principle.

MR. DARLING (Deptford) said, he did not think the proposal before the Committee went far enough. As he understood it, it dealt only with the question of Estate Duty, and did not touch a case that was once of particular interest to himself, where a person gave property in his lifetime, and quite unexpectedly died within a year. The property was given to a Museum which had no funds, and the Exchequer exacted from the estate a duty just as though the property had been left by will. There was no human being generous enough to pay the duty, so the Museum went to him, and he, though he had been deprived of that particular amount of property, paid the duty to enable the Museum to get that which had been given to it. The case would be provided for if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would deal with the question of exemption in a clause which would put upon a proper basis not only bequests or donations where the person died within 12 months, but which would also include Municipalities—if they were to be particularly considered—and also country Museums, which were much more deserving of bequests. But there was another matter which he understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer would at the same time have to deal with. If he did not misunderstand the law as it stood, bequests to Irish charities were already exempted. The 55th Geo. III., he was told, gave a particular benefit to Irish charities, which had not yet been extended to English charities. He had not the slightest doubt that, with a view of justice to Ireland, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would desire to put England and Scotland, and particularly Wales, on the same basis with Ireland in respect of exemptions from duty as to bequests made to these charities, and in order to do this it would be absolutely necessary not only to pass this Amendment, but to deal with other questions which might arise in regard to anyone of the Three Kingdoms.

COLONEL KENYON - SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, he wished to point out that this was not a matter of interest only to the Metropolis, and to the big Municipalities, but also to the rural districts and villages, and although it was quite possible that such words as those of the Amendment were desirable he could give instances of similar bequests in small villages, which were much more important to those villages than any gift to the nation would be. Therefore, while thoroughly in favour of any gifts to the nation and to Municipalities, he wanted to put in a word for the villages and the Parochial Authorities who were called upon to manage them. There were cases within his own knowledge of recreation grounds secured for villages and for rural districts, and he thought that anything meted out to the bigger Municipalities should be given in equal measure to the smaller bodies.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR, who was indistinctly heard, said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had looked at this matter in so conciliatory a spirit, and had shown himself so anxious to meet the wishes of the Committee, that he might venture to throw out a suggestion of his own. The greatest perplexity which the right hon. Gentleman would have to meet was the drawing of a distinction between one kind of charitable bequest and another. The right hon. Gentleman was prepared to exempt charities to the nation—he was somewhat doubtful whether he ought to exempt charities to Municipalities, and probably he would altogether refuse to exempt charities to the smaller parishes—at all events, from the point of view of the Exchequer, that would be the most doubtful case. But what he (Mr. A. J. Balfour) felt most in regard to large bequests to charities for public purposes was, not that the bequest was taxed, but that it was part of the aggregated property upon which the successor of the deceased was taxed. His right hon. Friend just now quoted the late Prime Minister as saying that these bequests were examples of organised spite. Well, he himself would not like to further the designs of spiteful individuals. In the case of a man who had a sense of the worth of public objects to which he left money, surely it was very wrong to put upon him, and still more to put upon his heirs, the heavy pecuniary loss which would arise from aggregating the property with the rest of the property left.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I must consider this with the other question. I feel rather in the position of the fisherman who opened a vessel and the spirit came out of it and its head was lost in the skies. Every moment the extent of the concession asked for grows. It appears to be infinite.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) moved, in page 11, line 28, after "respect," insert—

"Of any Museum, or collection of works of art, which for a period of 12 months preceding the death of the deceased, has been open to the public for two days in each week, or in respect."

He said that there were some generous and public-spirited persons who had formed Museums and thrown them open to the public, and a larger number who had valuable collections of pictures which the public were allowed to visit. It was hardly just that, under those circumstances, they should be called upon not only to pay Estate Duty, but that the value of the works of art should be added to the duty. A suggestion had been thrown out that the proposal of exemption should be confined to bequests to the nation. Of course, that would practically confine them to London, Edinburgh, and Dublin; but the Committee would agree that local Museums were of much importance, and that the collections in villages and small towns were particularly valuable. With regard to the two days a week, he would point out that those who had these collections kept them up entirely at their own expense, which entitled them to additional consideration. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken of defending the Revenue, but he was now speaking of defending the scientific and art riches of the country, which were quite as important as the Revenue. He might be told that if his proposal was acceded to persons would try to evade the Estate Duty by throwing open their collections, but he thought little weight attached to such an objection. In any case, he wished many more persons would open their collections to the public, and one of his objects in moving the Amendment was to encourage them to do so.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he thought this was part of the general question the Government would have to consider. He did not know whether his right hon. Friend meant to include private collections in private houses that were open to public view, of which there were many in the country. This, he feared, would open too wide a door. However, the whole subject would have to be carefully considered.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, that upon this occasion he felt the spirit of the tax collector rise within him. He did not think that any such exemption as this should be made. If works of utility were to be taxed under the new Estate Duty, so ought works of art, the greater part of which were the invention of bric-à-brac brokers and picture jobbers. Grosvenor House was often opened to the public. Madame Tussaud's was open to the public not only on two days but six days a week, and under this Amendment both the millionaire and the wax-works would be exempted. The Amendment ought not to be adopted, and he would stand by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in voting against it.

SIR J. LUBBOCK said, he was quite satisfied with the promise of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he would consider the question, and would ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) moved, in page 11, line 28, to leave out from "settled," to "before," in line 29, and insert—

"By any disposition (whether a will or an instrument inter vivos) taking effect."

He submitted that they ought to make it clear that if the disposition had taken effect before the commencement of this Act it ought to be exempted. He could not understand on what other principle the Government proposed to legislate. They had spread their net very wide with the view of getting as much money as possible, but he submitted that the principle of justice came in here, and it was not a right thing, when property had been settled with reference to the existing Death Duties, when the settlements had taken effect, or would take effect, before the passing of the Act, that such property should be subjected to the proposed Estate Duty.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 28, after the word "settled," to leave out to the word "before," in line 29, and insert the words—

"By any disposition (whether a will or an instrument inter vivos) taking effect."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*SIR J. RIGBY, who was indistinctly heard, said, the Government were legislating for the present and not for the future. This was called ex post facto legislation. Why? Take the Succession Duty, which for the first time imposed a Death Duty on real estate. Did that exclude existing settlements? Of course not. And with regard to the Probate Duties, the line which had always been drawn was when application was made for probate. It might be years after the Act passed, although it was not likely to be, of course; yet that was the time. When payment was made it must be made according to the law of the land.

Question put, and agreed to.

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendment was agreed to:—Page 11, line 30, before "Act," insert "part of this."

SIR R. WEBSTER moved, in page 11, line 30, to leave out from "Act," to "unless," in line 31, the words proposed to be left out being—

"In respect of which property Probate or Account Duty has been paid."

He submitted that it was not fair to restrict the cases of exemption to where the Probate or Account Duty had been paid. Circumstances might arise which would prevent the estate of a man who died before the Bill came into operation from being wound up for some time, and it would be unjust in such a case to bring the property within the provisions of the measure.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 30, to leave out from the word "Act," to the word "unless," in line 31.—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'in respect of which' stand part of the Clause."

*SIR J. RIGBY said, that the Government were merely following precedent in the matter, and a very convenient precedent. They did not want to have investigations from day to day in the office whether these duties should be payable or not. Each day when the accounts came in they would apply the law of the day. It always had been so.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, there were a number of reasons which interfered with the payment of the duty within 24 hours. The payment of the Probate or of the Account Duty might have been deferred by arrangement with the Commissioners, or an outstanding debt might have prevented the estate from being wound up. The Attorney General appeared to know nothing about the winding-up of estates, and seemed to think that if a man died to-day his estate could be wound up to-morrow.

Sir J. Rigby

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY (Bute-shire), who was indistinctly heard, said, there was a case not very long ago about paying duty upon the Hamilton Collection which was sold, and the question might have been raised. If the Amendment were not accepted the whole thing would be re-opened, and the duty paid on an entirely different scale.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, there was no principle of equity involved in this matter. It was a question of convenience. They had to tax the people as much as possible; they did not want to let off as many as possible. Every Amendment from the other side was to let off someone or other, but the duty of the Government was, he thought, to spread the net as widely as possible.

MR. J. LOWTHER observed that if a settlement were in the course of being carried into effect, and, owing to some cause over which the beneficiaries had no control, had been delayed, it seemed perfectly monstrous that the whole settlement should be ripped up and treated on a wholly distinct and different basis. That was as near ex post facto legislation as it was possible to get. He agreed that, as a general principle, these matters were dealt with according to the law of the land existing at the time the transaction was brought into settlement; but the Attorney General had not replied to the argument as to the injustice and inconvenience of subjecting a settlement in the process of being carried into effect to wholly different treatment, as was proposed by the Government.

MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) said, it had appeared in the course of this Debate that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his official capacity could not afford to have any conscience, but he thought it had not at any time more clearly appeared than in the speech of the Attorney General. Surely there ought to be a limit to the unconscientiousness of even a Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Attorney General said what the Government wanted to do was to draw their net as widely as possible, so as to get everybody they could within it. But if a private person were engaged in making an arrangement of this kind it would be regarded as an unconscionable arrangement. What was the equity of the matter? Here were two persons who died at the same time, before the commencement of this Act, who had made similar wills. There was a difference in the time it took to wind up the two estates. The executor of one estate wound it up quickly, and he paid duty on a different and much lighter scale than the one who happened to be later. But what was the difference? In the eye of the law a debt which was due and payable was precisely the same as a debt which was paid. It was only a debt. There was an estate there of a much larger value than the amount of his debt, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was as certain of his money as if it had been paid. What reason was there, in equity of conscience, that because of a fluke of that sort as to the date of payment one should pay a heavier duty than the other? The Attorney General said that they could not inquire into all these things. But the date of death was the material fact, and that was always disclosed on applying for probate. Again, in many cases the Probate Duty was at first underestimated. The executor might, before the commencement of this Act, have paid Probate Duty, which turned out to be not the whole of the amount due, and he would then, as the proposal of the Government stood, have to pay not merely the Probate Duty remaining unpaid, but would have become liable to pay Estate Duty instead of Probate Duty. He submitted that the Government in this matter ought to make the true criterion the date on which the person died, and accept the Amendment.

MR. HANBURY said, if the Attorney General did not accept some Amendment of this kind he was practically taking away, at the end of the sub-section, the very thing he had granted at the beginning. Undoubtedly the intention of the Government was that this Estate Duty should not be payable in the case of any person who died before the commencement of this Act. That ought to extend to a man dying any day before the commencement of the Act. But if a man died the day before the commencement of the Act it would be utterly impossible for him to have paid these duties. They would be payable, but would not have been paid, and he would not benefit by the exemptions of the Act.

SIR J. RIGBY said, that without exemption there could be no Estate Duty, except in the case of the estate of a person who died after the commencement of the Act. What they were dealing with, however, was not the case put by the hon. Member for Preston, but with property settled by a person who died before the commencement of the Act, and what they did was to say that if they had settled the accounts in respect of a death before the commencement of the Act they would not re-open them.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the Attorney General kept consistently blind to their contention. They had pointed out that it might be impossible to have settled the account, but why should they deprive a man who intended to settle, but had not had time to do so, of the advantage intended to be conferred on him by the sub section? It was perfectly monstrous to say that the man who had had time to pay the duty should be exempt, whilst the man who had not yet had time should not have the same advantage.

*MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.) pointed out that it might not be the fault of the man himself that the duty had not been paid, but the fault of the officials of Somerset House, who were very inquisitorial.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) confessed that he felt a difficulty in the matter. Of course, the deceased person mentioned in the second line of the sub-section was a different person to the person who died before the commencement of the Act, mentioned lower down, and it was upon the death of the former that the question arose. Say a man made a will settling certain property, it rested with the executor of that man as to whether Probate Duty was properly paid or not. That might be a totally different person to the deceased person on whose death the question arose, and the amount of duty payable on the death of A B on his estate would depend upon the negligence or quickness of another person, who might have a spite against him and might, out of spite, delay the settlement. Surely the amount of duty payable on the death of a deceased person might be made referable to his conduct; the amount could not depend upon the negligence or celerity of the executor of the person who had made the will under which the settlement arose, and who could, out of spite, cause the estate of the deceased person to lose value by simply holding back and neglecting to pay this duty according to the Act. He did not think that the Exchequer had any great interest in these cases, and without damage the Government might accept the Amendment by agreeing to the words and then they would do full justice without any loss to the Exchequer.

*MR. BUTCHER (York) said, they had been met in this, as in other cases, by the Government telling them they desired to spread their net as wide as possible. But surely they could spread it with some sense of fairness, equity, and justice. What they had done in this clause was to propose an exemption, and the Opposition desired to have that exemption placed on a reasonable footing. The Government said that where property was settled by the will of a person who died before the commencement of the Act the old Probate Duty scale should apply. If they stopped there that would be a reasonable and fair exemption; but they went a little further, and said that in order that these exemptions might apply the duty must have been actually paid. That was a purely arbitrary condition to put upon their exemptions, and made it a matter of pure chance whether the exemption should apply or not. The proper and reasonable condition to consider was whether the man had or had not died before the commencement of the Act? Once a will was made and the man had died they could not alter the will. The man would not know this large Estate Duty would have been payable, and he could not do what he otherwise would have done—namely, alter the will to meet the alteration of the duty, so that the condition to consider was the death of the person who died before the commencement of the Act. As the matter stood, it was a purely accidental matter whether or not the duty was paid. The difficulty would be entirely got over if the words suggested by his right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin, "paid and payable," were accepted. The alteration would improve the section, and remove an anomaly and an injustice.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY (Bute-shire) said, the Government charged interest up to the date of the account, which was tantamount to holding that the thing ought to be paid at the date it was payable. It seemed absolutely unjust to charge interest for not having paid at the proper time, and, at the same time, to cut them out from the benefit of the exemption if the account had not been settled.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, the hon. and learned Gentleman who had last spoken confused two different things. The Government left the Probate Duty alone, and all they had here was the Estate Duty, and where they charged interest by this Bill it was on the Estate Duty. If they had settled an account by reason of a death before the commencement of the Act they would not re-open it. That was all they said, and they never meant anything more. If it was an anomaly it had been done before again and again, and ought to be done.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY: I said not a word about the Succession Duty.

SIR J. RIGBY: Neither did I.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY: I beg the hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon. The first words he addressed to me were that I had spoken about the Succession Duty, which he said he did not touch, and that he left Probate Duty alone.

*SIR J. RIGBY: I said most plainly the Estate Duty. That is what we charge. I said that where we charged interest we charged it on the Estate Duty by this Bill, and I went on to say that with regard to probate we left that according to the old law.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY said, it made no difference whether the hon. and learned Gentleman said Estate or Succession Duty. In either case he entirely misunderstood the purport of his (Mr. Graham Murray's) observations. He was not speaking of what they did in this Bill, but to the point made over and over again by his hon. Friends behind that it ought to be made quite clear that the exemptions should apply when the Probate Duty was payable and not whether, by accident or not, it happened to be paid.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) ventured to think the Attorney General was confusing physical and logical accidents when he said all things were accidents. The logical essence as distinguished from the accidental was the death on which the liability accrued. The very first words in Clause 1, "Every person dying after the commencement of this Act," were condemnatory of the attitude taken up by the Government on this Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 226; Noes 172.—(Division List, No. 125.)

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 30, to leave out the words "Probate or Account Duty," and insert the words

"Any duty mentioned in paragraphs one and two of the First Schedule to this Act."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.) Question, "That the word proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) said, he had an Amendment on the Paper with the object of including in the clause a case about which a good deal of doubt existed. That was, whether a man who succeeded to a legacy from an estate on which Probate Duty had been paid, such Probate Duty having been paid by the residuary legatee, would be held to have succeeded to a property in respect to which Probate or Account Duty had been paid, and therefore not liable to Estate Duty? He would like to hear the Attorney General on that question before he decided what action he would take in regard to his Amendment.

SIR J. RIGBY said, that legacies had nothing to do with this clause. Probate was paid on the whole estate, out of which the legacy would be paid. There was no manner of doubt that the legatee was protected against the Estate Duty.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the Solicitor General had disappointed him. The number of cross references which a person would have to make in order to arrive at an opinion with regard to the Bill was stupendous already; and now the Solicitor General proposed, by this Amendment, to add to them. It was cruel.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR R. WEBSTER moved, in page 11, line 31, after the word "paid," to insert the words

This Amendment was necessary owing to the defeat of the last Amendment he had moved. The object of it was to secure that if, owing to some accident or difficulty, Probate Duty or Account Duty had not been paid on the property, the Estate Duty should not exceed a higher rate than 3 per cent. Under the clause as it stood if an arrangement was made with Somerset House authorities that the payment of the Probate or Account Duty should be postponed, that accidental fact would render the estate liable to an increased duty of 5 or 6 per cent. Surely the proper position to take, if they did not exempt such properties altogether from the Estate Duty, was to fix some percentage beyond which duty could not be paid. He hoped the Government would, at any rate, make that small concession.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 31, after the word "paid," to insert the words—

"And if no such duty has been paid in respect of the property, then Estate Duty shall not be paid in respect thereof at a higher rate than 3 per cent."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR J. RIGBY said, the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to forget that the more people who were relieved from this duty the more pressure there would be upon those who were liable for it. By cutting down the incidence of taxation they created an inequality. He ventured to think that all the reasons which guided the House in refusing the other two Amendments ought to apply to this Amendment. He could not understand the logic of hon. Gentlemen opposite. They applied to have, first one class and then another class—not necessarily meritorious people, not necessarily indigent people, but average people and average estates—exempted from the operation of the Act.

MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) said, the more he looked at this clause the less he was able to understand it. He failed to see the logic of the clause, and failed to see how it would operate. He would like to ask the Attorney General, if the hon. and learned Member would not mind answering the question, whether it was meant in a case of personal property settled left by a person dying before the commencement of the Act, where the Probate Duty had not been paid, that the Estate Duty was to be exacted in substitution for the Probate Duty? He could not see the logic of making the Estate Duty payable out of the second estate, because the first had not paid Probate Duty. In such a case, if the second estate paid Estate Duty, it would be paid by the second testator in substitution for the Probate Duty which had not been paid by the first testator.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that all the Attorney General did was to sit on the pavement and chalk opposite himself, "I am literally starving." He simply said, "I want the money; I must have it, and I don't care whether it is got justly or unjustly." But the Opposition was bound to consider the equality and justice of the demand, and they proposed that if Estate Duty was to be levied in those cases as a substitution for previous duties which had not been paid, the Estate Duty should not exceed 3 per cent.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, it would be desirable that they should understand the clause before they proceeded to decide upon it. It was evident from the speeches which had been delivered that great doubt existed as to what the clause meant. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, the Attorney General, had contended himself, in his reply to his learned Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight, with urging that it was very absurd to excuse Mr. A and Mr. B from paying this Estate Duty because Messrs. C, D, E, and F would have to pay a heavier Estate Duty. That was true enough; but it did not answer the question which had been put to the Government, which was, whether Mr. A and Mr. B were, or were not, unjustly charged under the Bill? If his hon. and learned Friend was right in the interpretation of the clause, then the clause was quite indefensible. If his hon. and learned Friend was wrong, let his error be explained by the Government. But according to their understanding of the clause it would have this extraordinary effect: If a man died in February or January, before the Bill was brought in, or even completed in the minds of its authors, because the estate of that man would not be wound up at the time of the passing of the Act, for the reason, perhaps, that the executor had not been able to come to an agreement with Somerset House as to the amount of probate to be paid, therefore the property of that individual was not to be taxed under the old but under the new system. Two men might die on the same day of the same month leaving estates in a similar fashion. In one case, where the executor winds up the estate quickly, duty was paid under the old system; in the other case, where the executor winds up the estate slowly, duty was paid under the new system. If that were the meaning of the clause, he defied the Attorney General to say it was in conformity with justice, equality, or common sense. But it might not be the meaning of the clause; the Opposition might be in error; but, if so, let the Government tell them what the clause really did mean. They had come to the conclusion it was the monstrous absurdity which he had made clear to the House; and if they were right, it was more like piracy on the high seas than the finance of a civilized country.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, he thought he understood the clause, but it was a very difficult business; and if he were right his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition had not exhausted its most absurd and most singular consequences. He would give the Committee one illustration. A man with two sons died at the beginning of the year. He left the second son a large sum of money for life with remainder to the children of the second son, and he made his eldest son his executor. The second son died after the commencement of the Act. The Estate Duty paid on the second sum so settled depended on whether the eldest brother had paid Probate Duty or not. He thought it was a curious provision, by which the Estate Duty on the estate of a man dying before the passing of the Act depended on the activity or negligence of a person interested in another estate, and who might have a personal interest in not paying it, because he could save his profit at the other. They should keep the liability of an estate at the point where the liability arose.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, he had already explained the clause in the plainest language, which should have left no room for doubt in the minds of any hon. Members. It was not intended to interfere with settled accounts; and with regard to the case mentioned by his right hon. Friend with reference to residuary legatees, the result of such negligence should be visited upon himself, and not upon others. It was not the case that a residuary legatee would have to pay the whole amount. The Government were making a concession. Hon. Members might think it large or small, but it was a concession. Perhaps, if he had his own way in the matter, he would strike out the whole clause, and so there would be no concession at all. He did not see why the Government should at the instance of hon. Members opposite invent a case for letting people off under exemptions to which they had no more right than thousands of others, and go beyond the practical necessities of the case.

*MR. MATTHEWS said, that he had listened with the greatest confusion of mind to the speech which the hon. and learned Attorney General had just made. He appeared to have informed the Committee that Estate Duty could be claimable in the case of a man who died before the Bill became law. It seemed that nothing but Probate Duty could ever be recovered, and no Estate Duty.

SIR J. RIGBY: No. It may have been an omission on my part, but I certainly intended to explain it.

*MR. MATTHEWS asked, then what was the meaning of his hon. and learned Friend's speech? He could not see why anyone should be exempted because somebody else had been prompt in paying the Probate Duty. On all occasions they were met by the most painful confusion between the death of the person liable before the commencement of this Act and the decease when the Estate Duty arose. To take the illustration of the right hon. Gentleman. If a man died before the commencement of the Act, leaving a residuary legatee, and with respect to a certain portion of his property, say £10,000, settled that on his wife, afterwards to his eldest son, and then to children; whether the executor paid Probate Duty promptly or not, the Exchequer would never get more than Probate Duty. If Estate Duty was payable only on the death of persons who died after the commencement of this Act, no Estate Duty could ever be payable in respect of the death of that settlor. But then came this exemption, which had never so far been dealt with, and which surpassed for absurdity anything else to be met with in this Bill. If the settlor's executor had paid Probate Duty, the wife might die, and, the son succeeding, there would be an exemption from the Estate Duty which would prima facie be payable. But, on the other hand, if the original settlor's executor had delayed payment of the Estate Duty for a short time longer, no exemption would arise. He did not know why persons were to be exempted from payment of duty by the happening of the mere accident of diligence or delay in winding up a different estate.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, he would not like the Committee to remain under a misapprehension. He was, no doubt, wrong in the interpretation he had put on the case referred to by his right hon. Friend. It seemed impossible to suppose that people would be so foolish as allow one man's liability to depend upon the diligence or even upon the honesty of another. People could hardly be so foolish, though they might be fraudulent. The executor would be appointed by the testator, and if he desired to provide against the occurrence of such a penalty one of the younger members of the family would be designated. But the younger branches would have their remedy without such an appointment. It came to this: that when the executor was left solely responsible for the management of the estate, he might manage well or ill, and his diligence or negligence would affect the incidence of the duty. He could see no absurdity in that. If the Committee were to attempt to provide minutely for all kinds of cases, not 20 clauses, nor 200, would deal with them.

MR. BOUSFIELD said, that an impression prevailed that when Estate Duty was payable it became payable in substitution for Probate Duty which was not payable. He asked the right hon. Gentleman the simple question, whether that was so or not?

*SIR J. RIGBY said, there was some truth in the suggestion that the Estate Duty was a substitute for the Probate Duty; but the Probate Duty was only payable on one class of property. He thought the Committee should abide by the terms of the scheme propounded by the Government. The concession made had been forced upon the Government by the state of things, but the supporters of the Amendment wanted to go further. There was absolutely no reason for this, and it would constitute a gift to personality at the expense of realty.

MR. BOUSFIELD referred again to the case he originally put to the Attorney General, in which £10,000 Consols had been left by the first testator, who had created a life interest for the benefit of the second testator. He desired to know whether he was right in concluding that, in a case where Probate Duty had been paid on the first death, the Estate Duty which would become payable on the second death was, or was not, in substitution for the Probate Duty? Some hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House thought that the Estate Duty in such a case was to be in substitution for the Probate Duty.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, that there was no case in which Estate Duty and Probate Duty could be payable together under this Bill. That was perfectly obvious. The whole scheme of the measure prevented it.

MR. BOUSFIELD said, he was glad to have obtained that explicit answer. At last the Committee was in possession of a clear statement from the Government on the subject. He thought, however, that, upon that construction, the curious result would follow that the Government scheme, so far from encouraging executors to be diligent, offered to them a distinct inducement not to pay the Probate Duty promptly. This seemed to be a payment in substitution. If A failed to pay the Probate Duty, instead of that duty coming out of A's estate it became Probate Duty payable out of B's estate. If that were so, then A's executors so far from being encouraged by this provision to pay promptly would neglect their duty, because it would be distinctly to their advantage to do so. Even in point of drafting the clause was by no means clear.

*MR. MATTHEWS still failed to understand the Attorney General's statement. Did his hon. and learned Friend agree that Estate Duty could never be payable in the case of a man dying before the passing of this measure? But, again, he would point out that no intelligent explanation had been offered of the distinction involved in the exemption allowed by the Government. The person in default would not be the person to be charged with the Estate Duty. The first testator could never owe anything but Probate Duty, however much he might be in default; and the exemption was, to his mind, a senseless one, if it was intended to exempt estates chargeable with Probate Duty. Either no exemption should be made at all or it should apply to the proper people.

MR. BARTLEY said, it would be a mere accident in many cases whether the executor had completed the payments of the Probate Duty or not. Since the beginning of the year a great number of these estates had fallen in. Some of these had been hurried through and some had not. One very large estate might be mentioned belonging to a certain nobleman which was hurried through in a way which excited much comment. Upon that estate £27,000 was paid; but if this Bill had previously become law £48,000 would have had to be paid. Why, he asked, had this clause been framed in such a way as to cover such a case as that? Not, he quite agreed, that it was a very astonishing matter that there should be such an inconsistency in this Bill. The Committee were entitled to know how this clause was intended to be framed, and he had hoped the Solicitor General would have been able to give some explanation of it.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 163; Noes 223.—(Division List, No. 126.)

MR. R. T. REID moved, in page 11, line 31, after the word "was," to insert the words "at the time of his death or at any time had been," competent to dispose of the property.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that the words "or at any time had been" should not be adopted. He submitted that the Amendment which stood on the Paper in his own name, to insert the words "at the time of his death," were better than those proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman, as the latter would negative the effect of the Amendment. He would move to omit the words "or at any time had been."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "or at any time had been."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

*SIR J. RIGBY was understood to say that the Amendment was drawn up to deal with property that came into settlement under a will or other instrument vesting it in some person who was competent to dispose of it. He thought the proper limitation was not the time of death. It was a question of settlement or no settlement, and as soon as a person became "competent to dispose" that ended the settlement. The words as proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman would be too wide.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that although the Attorney General considered the words "at the time of his death" too wide, he (Sir R. Webster) regarded them as governing words. Perhaps the words "since the date of the disposition" would meet the hon. and learned Gentleman's view.

MR. R. T. REID said, that if the Amendments were withdrawn, new words might be proposed which would effect the desired object.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. R. T. REID said, the following words might meet the case:—

"At the time of his death or at any time since the will or disposition took effect had been."

Question proposed, "That those words be inserted."

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, the words now proposed would not have a different effect to those originally proposed.

MR. R. T. REID said, the words of the first Amendment meant any time in the man's lifetime, whereas those now proposed would mean any time after the disposition.

MR. TOMLINSON said, the man might have had power under settlement to dispose of property within a limited time of his death—say a year. What was to happen in that case?

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he had thought on the spur of the moment that the new words proposed by the Solicitor General would be satisfactory; but on reflection he had come to the conclusion that they would not go far enough. Suppose there had been a settlement made 10 years before on a person for life with a power of appointment, and that the man had made an appointment under this power since that settlement that would make the property liable to Estate Duty. He thought the words he had originally put on the Paper were the best, and that his original view that the governing time should be the time of death was right. He would ask the Solicitor General to consider the point very carefully between now and the Report.

MR. R. T. REID said, the Committee would adopt his Amendment, but hon. Gentlemen opposite need not consider it binding. If they were found objectionable they could be put right on Report.

MR. BARCLAY said, they had got to this stage in the Bill drafted by the skilled draftsmen of whom they had heard so much—namely, an Amendment was put down by the Solicitor General; it was twice amended, and there was some idea that it ought to be amended again on Report. This was rather an interesting incident in connection with the clause.

Question put, and agreed to.

*MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) said, that in Clause 17 they had exempted certain settled property from payment of duty. He now begged to propose the addition of the following words:—

"And the property thus exempted from payment of Estate Duty shall not be aggregated or taken into account in determining the rate of Estate Duty to be paid."

If a man died worth £10,000 and made a will leaving it to someone for life, and after that to someone absolutely, then if the Probate Duty was paid on the first life under the exemption no duty would be paid on the £10,000 when the life interest fell in, but they had done nothing to prevent aggregation. Without this Amendment the £10,000 would be taken into account and added to the amount the person holding the life interest might leave behind him. If he left, say, £10,000 of his own, he would be charged on that at the rate of duty which he would have paid if the other £10,000 had been chargeable. The Government ought either to accept his Amendment or on Report to make it clear in Clause 3 that property which was not itself liable to duty should not be taken into account in determining aggregation.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 32, after the word "property," to insert the words—

"and the property thus exempted from payment of Estate Duty shall not be aggregated or taken into account in determining the rate of Estate Duty to be paid."—(Mr. Dodd.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, the hon. Gentleman desired what the Government desired—namely, that property not liable to duty should not be aggregated in claiming duty against other property. The Government thought that was provided for by an Amendment they had adopted a few days ago. If, however, on consideration, it was found that by the insertion of the word "such" before property, in Clause 3, this meaning would be made clear there might be no objection to the adoption of the word. It would not be wise to accept the present Amendment, as the effect of rendering the meaning clear in this part of the Bill might make the meaning of Clause 3 doubtful.

MR. DODD said, the clause referred to contained the words "all property passing shall be aggregated." It did not say "all such property."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) moved to insert at the end of Sub-section (1) the following:—

"In the case of property settled by a will or disposition made before the commencement of this Act where Succession Duty has been paid on the property under Section 2 of 'The Succession Duty Act, 1853,' the amount of Succession Duty so paid shall be allowed as a deduction from the Estate Duty payable under this Act."

The Amendment was not in any way aimed at establishing a difference between realty and personalty in favour of realty. He would put the case on its merits and would show that, in certain cases of settlement, realty would pass one and a-half times as much as personalty, and in some cases nearly double. He would be able to present to the Committee some figures which he would defy either the Attorney or Solicitor General to challenge. Let them take the case of a settlement made before the passing of the Bill under which, in the case of personalty, Probate Duty had been paid. £50,000 worth of personalty, if it went to a lineal on the first life, would pay £2,000; the same amount of realty on the fall of the first life, taking it at the capital value of £37,500, would pay £937 Succession Duty, and an Estate Duty of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., amounting to £2,250. Thus altogether realty would pay £3,187 as against £2,000 paid by personalty. That was the position in regard to lineals. But in the case of collaterals, taking, for instance, the case of a nephew, personalty on the first life would pay £2,000 probate, plus £1,500 Legacy Duty; realty, on the other hand, would pay £5,812, as compared with £3,500 paid by personalty, an increase of about 70 per cent. When they came to aggregation the case was still worse. If £50,000 of personalty and £50,000 of realty were left in settlement by the same testator the estate would, on the principle of aggregation, have to pay about £6,500 on the realty, as against £3,500 on the personalty. It was absolutely impossible that this inequality, representing as it did 50, 60, 70, and even 95 per cent., should be imposed on realty, as compared with personalty under one and the same settlement. If they took higher figures the results as regarded realty came out even worse. Let them take an estate of £100,000. Personalty would pay £4,000, and realty £7,370 in the case of a lineal; in the case of a collateral, the payments would be personalty £7,000, and realty £12,625, and in the case of aggregation they would be personalty £4,000, and realty £7,800 in the case of a lineal, and £7,800 and £13,125 respectively in the case of a collateral. He did not think that any apology was needed for troubling the Committee with those figures. This inequality could not have been contemplated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He claimed at the hands of the Solicitor General that he should not on this occasion be met with a reply in the form of general facts and general professions of a desire for equality of treatment between personalty and realty. Forty or 50 different hard and unjustifiable cases of inequality had already been brought forward by hon. Members, and in no single case had an attempt been made on the part of the Government to controvert the figures. In each case they had been met with generalisations as to the desire for equality. There had been noticeable an indisposition on the part of the Government to come to close quarters with them on the question of facts as they bore on individuals. He did not want to complicate the point by the suggestion of the further fact that it was more difficult for land than for personalty to pay, because a great deal of the land which would be valued for the purpose of the duty would not be rent-producing land. They knew that the desire of the Government was that the income of the year, whether from personalty or from realty, should pay the amount, and it could not be to the advantage of any class that many new mortgages should be created. All he claimed was that which had, he understood, been conceded by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the case of colonial revenues, i.e., that property already taxed should, when taxed again, be given credit for what had been taken from it the first time. They would thus provide that the taxation on land should not be more than that on personalty, and that realty should not be made to pay twice over under the same settlement. That point had already been conceded in the case of personalty, and although it might be suggested that personalty had to pay much earlier in the day, he did not think that was any justification for the inequality which, as he had pointed out, was being created by this clause. He trusted that the Solicitor General would deal with the Amendment not merely from a draftsman's point of view, but from the broader point of justice, and in the spirit of fairness with which the Government ought to consider the great interests involved.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 32, at end, insert—

"In the case of property settled by a will or disposition made before the commencement of this Act where Succession Duty has been paid on the capital value of the property under Section 2 of 'The Succession Duty Act, 1853,' the amount of Succession Duty so paid shall be allowed as a deduction from the Estate Duty payable under this Act."—(Mr. Brodrick.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, the hon. Gentleman had appealed to him not to seek to escape from the difficulty of grappling with the figures he had quoted, and not to deal merely in generalities. He was not aware that it would fairly be charged against him that that hitherto had been the course he had pursued, but he would like to point out that he could not be expected to reply to a series of figures involving three several complications when they had only been supplied to him three minutes before the speech was delivered. He understood now that the proposition of the hon. Gentleman was that personal property which had already paid Probate Duty should during the tenancy of the settlement be free from payment of Estate Duty. But that was not the proposition of the Amendment, which had been altered since it appeared originally on the Paper by the omission of the words "capital value." The hon. Member urged that some equivalent should be given to settled realty and personalty to the extent that the amount paid under the Succession Duty Act should be deducted from the Estate Duty. But why not carry out the same principle with the Legacy Duty? The Government could not agree to make a deduction in the case of Succession Duty when there was no deduction in the case of Legacy Duty.

MR. BRODRICK said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had misinterpreted the Amendment, the object of which was to provide that where Succession Duty had been paid by realty it should be deducted from the Estate Duty. There was no intention whatever to deduct Succession Duty from personalty, which had already been entirely relieved by a former payment.

MR. R. T. REID said, that was not what the Amendment indicated, and he was not responsible for the drafting of it. He repeated that they could not relieve realty of the Succession Duty unless they treated legacies in the same manner.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, that while the hon. and learned Gentleman had answered a portion of the speech of the hon. Member for Guildford, he considered that he had not dealt with the substance of his hon. Friend's case, in which some of them thought there was considerable force. Of course, there was some foundation for the excuse that he had not had time to study the figures, but that did not at all detract from the strength of the case that had been put forward—namely, that a certain advantage had been given to personalty by the clause which had just been passed. His hon. Friend wished to extend to realty the great advantage of being cleared in advance for a certain time when Succession Duty had been paid. He was sure the hon. and learned Gentleman would not wish to take advantage of any defect in the Amendment, but would desire to remove the inequality which his hon. Friend had by means of his figures pointed out as certain to arise. Undoubtedly if those figures were correct—and he hoped their accuracy would be brought home to the mind of the Solicitor General—there was an injustice for which a remedy ought to be found. Could not the hon. and learned Gentleman see that a privilege had been given to personalty which had been withheld from realty, and that the difference represented as much as 50, 60, and even 70 per cent. to the disadvantage of realty? Although the Government were not responsible for the drafting of an Amendment, he did submit it was their duty to recognise an inequality of treatment when it was proved to exist, and to attempt to provide a remedy.

MR. R. T. REID said, he was not aware that he had attempted to shelter himself under the words of the Amendment. He had, however, submitted, and he again urged that it was impossible for him to deal offhand with the figures which the hon. Gentleman had presented. All he could promise was that if, after studying them, it appeared that an inequality did exist, the Government would try to remove it.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he did not think anyone had understood, or ever would understand, the clause, and he confessed that personally he was at a loss to know at what the Amendment aimed. The clause was, he felt, an almost hopeless one; it had no doubt been inserted in consequence of some official scruple, and he did not think anyone would ever understand it.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, this was another instance of the difficulty experienced by hon. Members interested in realty. They had had in support of the Amendment a perfectly clear and lucid statement by the hon. Member for Guildford, and if the figures which had been quoted were correct there was a distinct inequality of treatment in favour of the interests of personalty and against the interests of realty. It was perfectly fair for the Solicitor General to say he had not had time to realise the full strength of the case which had been submitted to the Committee, and it was only right he should have an opportunity of considering it; but it was equally clear that hon. Members entrusted with the duty of defending the interests of realty were bound to insist on a remedy being found. They did not desire to withdraw by one tittle any favour shown to personalty, but they did think they had a right to secure equality of treatment for realty; and he thought the Solicitor General and the officials behind him would find the figures quoted a very hard nut indeed to crack. They would hold the hon. and learned Gentleman tight to his promise to deal with this question.

MR. BARTLEY was of opinion that the clause, which had been very carefully worded in order to meet certain cases, would, whether the Amendment was inserted or not, lead to considerable irritation. The clause would hereafter be known by the name of a certain estate belonging to a certain noble Lord.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That is not relevant to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. BARTLEY said, the estate was well-known.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must confine himself to the Amendment.

MR. BARTLEY said, the Amendment bore very closely on the clause itself. Although he should vote for the Amendment if it were pressed to a Division, he agreed with what had fallen from the hon. Member for Lynn Regis; he did not approve of it because it gave an advantage to certain individuals and not to a whole class, and he thought it would be better if it were withdrawn, and a fresh clause brought up on Report.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.) said, he was sure the Solicitor General would give his attention to the matter. But at the same time he considered that if the figures presented by his hon. Friend were correct there was a real grievance, and there ought to be further inquiry as to the existence of the inequality which they disclosed. He was confident the Government would desire to redress any such grievance, and would not be prevented from carrying out that policy by an argument which for one moment seemed to commend itself to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General. Let the hon. and learned Gentleman remember that if this Bill had any claim to public consideration that claim must be founded upon the contention of the Government that all classes of property were to be equally dealt with. He did not know whether, under the circumstances, his hon. Friend would think it desirable to divide the House. If he did so he (Mr. Balfour) should certainly divide with him, but on the whole he thought they had got all they could out of the discussion, which could be renewed when they came to a later stage of the Bill.

*MR. BRODRICK said, he was surprised at the course taken by the Solicitor General, in view of the fact that his figures had been placed before him a fortnight ago, and that he had then indicated his willingness to consider them on Clause 17.

MR. R. T. REID interrupted, and made some observations which were inaudible in the Gallery.

MR. BRODRICK said, he was quite ready to follow his right hon. Friend's advice on this matter. He would, however, ask the Solicitor General to remember that if the Bill remained in its present shape a grave injustice would be done. Under these circumstances, he hoped that the Government would put down an Amendment before the Report stage was reached; but, if not, he would himself put down an Amendment and take the sense of the House upon it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. R. T. REID moved the following new sub-section. Page 11, line 36, at end, add—

"(3) Where an interest in expectancy in any property has, before the commencement of this part of this Act, been bonâ fide sold or mortgaged for full consideration in money or money's worth then no other duty on such property shall be payable by the purchaser or mortgagee when the interest falls into possession than would have been payable if this Act had not passed; and in the case of a mortgage, any higher duty payable by the mortgagor shall rank as a charge subsequent to that of the mortgagee."

The hon. and learned Gentleman explained that the clause had been put down in pursuance of a promise made by the Government, and he hoped it would meet the point which had been raised at an earlier stage by the hon. Member for Islington.

Question proposed, "That the sub-section be there added."

MR. BARTLEY said, he was obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman for having introduced this Amendment, which he believed would have the effect of carrying out the object he had in view. He did not pretend to the knowledge of a lawyer upon this matter, but still he thought the Amendment met his purpose.

Question put, and agreed to.

On Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following sub-section was agreed to:—

"(4) The further Estate Duty of 1 per centum shall not be payable on property settled by a disposition which has taken effect before the commencement of this part of this Act."

MR. R. T. REID moved, after the last Amendment, to add the words—

"(5) Where a husband or wife is entitled, either solely or jointly with the other, to the income of any property settled by the other under a disposition which has taken effect before the commencement of this part of this Act, and on his or her death the survivor becomes entitled to the income of the property settled by such survivor, Estate Duty shall not be payable on that property until the death of the survivor."

The hon. and learned Gentleman said that this last Amendment was introduced in the place of that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol.

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*MR. BUTCHER (York) moved to amend the sub-section so that it would apply to all cases in which the surviving husband or wife "becomes upon the death of the other entitled to the income of any settled property."

He said he knew of no principle why this exception should not be made in the case of a stranger. No doubt his hon. and learned Friend attached some importance to the unity of husband and wife. [Mr. R. T. REID: No.] Well, he regretted to hear that that principle was thrown overboard. He repeated that he knew of no reason which would justify this exemption in the case of a settlement by husband and wife upon themselves which would not apply equally to the case of a settlement upon them.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 1, to leave out from the word "wife," to the word "estate," in line 5, and insert the words "becomes upon the death of the other entitled to the income of any settled property."—(Mr. Butcher.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. R. T. REID said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press his Amendment. The new sub-section which he (Mr. R. T. Reid) had put down was of a particular and specific character, and the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman was entirely without its scope.

MR. BARTLEY said, the Solicitor General did not happen to be in his place, or was there present any other Member of the Government, but he supposed that did not matter, as what they said did not receive much attention, though upon a Bill of this sort it was rather awkward to have a discussion upon a very technical matter with no Member of the Government or a single supporter of the Government in the House. The concession made by the learned Solicitor General related to the case of a husband or wife entitled, either solely or jointly with the other, to the income of property settled by the other. The learned Solicitor General said he had agreed to make this concession on the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol (Sir M. Hicks-Beach). That was perfectly true, and they were so far grateful for small mercies, but something further was promised. It would be to the recollection of the Committee that he (Mr. Bartley) raised the case of a joint annuity between husband and wife, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, though he did not agree to the proposal, said he would carefully consider the point and deal with it in a subsequent clause. That being so, this was the place and the sub-section in which it ought to be introduced, and in which it must come in if it was to come in at all. In the words proposed by the learned Solicitor General there was no indication of that at all. It was true that, to a large extent, the case of a large jointure was met by the Amendment of the learned Solicitor General, but he (Mr. Bartley) was concerned with the smaller jointures of husband and wife. A great number of these cases came before him, and he had recommended them to secure something for their old age by means of a joint annuity, and he naturally expected, after what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the case would be dealt with upon this clause. It was quite true that upon other sub-sections the learned Solicitor General had dealt with the question of reversions and other matters, but he could not find any other sub-section or clause where this particular case of joint annuities was dealt with. He was glad to see that one Member of the Government had come into the House at last, and perhaps the learned Postmaster General would be able to give them all the information they desired, and he would, therefore, venture to begin his line of argument again. He saw that another Member of the Government had dropped in—the Secretary to the Board of Trade—and he would repeat the point he was arguing, which concerned the question of joint annuities, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised he would consider and bring up upon a subsequent clause. For the information of the Government, which was now so ably represented by the Postmaster General, he would say that the clause they were now discussing must be the clause on which this question must be raised. The words of the learned Solicitor General were these—

That was the only clause which the Government had brought up, and it did not in any way touch the case of the husband and wife who were entitled to a small joint annuity, terminable at the death of both, and which was particularly referred to in the earlier part of the Bill, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised to bring forward at a subsequent period an Amendment or clause that would deal with the question. There were a large number of persons who had no one belonging to them whom it was desirable to encourage to make provision for themselves in old age. If no provision such as he asked for was introduced the selfishness of man would probably take the form of buying an annuity on the chance of one of them, either the wife or the husband, living the longest. There was, of course, the risk that the life named might be the first to drop out, in which case very great hardship would be inflicted, and the husband or the wife, as the case might be, would be left destitute. He was glad now to see the learned Solicitor General in his place, as he could now bring the matter before him, and he would begin, for the third time, the whole argument again. He was very sorry for this, and that they had all had to hurry over their frugal meal, but he would now address himself specially to the learned Solicitor General.

The point he wished to bring before the learned Solicitor General was the case of a joint annuitant. As the learned Gentleman would remember, the Chancellor of the Exchequer in an earlier part of the Debates promised to consider the question of joint annuities, and this was the clause upon which the question must be considered. Under the Bill as it stood, if one life dropped out the survivor, though it might be a small annuity, would have to pay Estate Duty on the life interest of half the annuity. That was sought to be an unfair proposal, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, though he did not agree to exempt all annuities, did agree that the case of small joint annuities should fairly come within the province of some clause. The clause they were now considering was clearly the clause in which the exemption should be made. He did not know whether the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend would quite cover the question, but it would certainly go in part in that direction, and was an improvement upon the words proposed by the learned Solicitor General. What he wished to impress upon the learned Solicitor General was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had promised that he would favourably consider the case of joint annuities of husband and wife, and bring the question up upon some clause. This, he submitted, was the proper clause, but as drafted they would not be included, and neither would they come within the learned Solicitor General's Amendment. It was quite true that it could be inserted upon Report, but he would remind the learned Solicitor General that the Report stage was getting so complicated and difficult that when they did reach it it would be found to be almost more difficult to get through than the Committee stage itself; therefore, it was desirable to dispose of as many questions as possible in Committee. Under the circumstances, he would urge the learned Solicitor General to introduce words that would safeguard the interests of these annuitants, a proceeding which the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated he was favourable to.

MR. R. T. REID said, the promise given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to consider whether something could not be done with respect to the cases of annuities between husband and wife. He was quite certain that the Chancellor of the Exchequer having given that promise had or would give full consideration to the matter and introduce it in its proper place if he found he was able to do so; but he (Mr. R. T. Reid) would point out that it would be entirely out of place in this Clause 17, which was the clause dealing with definitions.

MR. BARTLEY: No; Clause 18 is the Definition Clause.

MR. R. T. REID said, that Clause 17 was "Savings" and Clause 18 "Definitions," but the proposal applied to both one and the other. Let him make this clear: that, so far as he was concerned, his Amendment was intended to fulfil a pledge given to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol (Sir M. Hicks-Beach), and did not profess to be a discharge of a pledge given to the hon. Gentleman. In his view, the place, or at all events a good place, to do that would be by means of a new clause.

MR. BARTLEY said, he was satisfied with the statement of the learned Solicitor General that the matter would be dealt with.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he must apologise for his temporary absence before the adjournment, but he understood that in his absence some kind of complaint was made by the hon. and learned Solicitor General of his (Sir R. Webster) having put down this Amendment. If any complaint was to be made he hoped it would be made when he was in the House, and had an opportunity of replying to it.

MR. R. T. REID: I most distinctly abstained from making any complaint; it is not my practice to complain of the hon. and learned Gentleman behind his back.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that after the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman he was sure he was incorrectly informed, but he had been informed that the learned Solicitor General complained that he (Sir R. Webster) ought not to have put down these Amendments. He must say he knew of no arrangement preventing his putting down this Amendment, and he put this and the others down upon their merits, and he was quite prepared to justify them. His suggestion was that the exemptions or the indulgences, which was the right word to use, of the Solicitor General did not go as far as they ought from any point of view. There were three limitations: first, the limitation extending only to the case in which the settlement was made before the commencement of the Act; secondly, the settlement made by the husband or the wife; and the third, in which the survivor was the settlor. He wished to know why it should be limited to settlements made before the commencement of this part of the Act. If it was right and just—and the hon. and learned Solicitor General admitted it was—that the settlement should be for the benefit of the survivor without payment of Estate Duty on the first life, if that was the true principle, it ought to be applied to settlements after the passing of this Act. And, further, he wished to know why it should not be extended to the settlor? Would the learned Solicitor General tell them on what ground he justified the exclusion from the purview of the sub-section the case where there had been the same settlement made by a brother or the same settlement made by a father? He submitted that in order to be reasonable the words contained in the Solicitor General's Amendment must be left out, and the words he proposed introduced, so that the clause would then read—

"Where a husband or wife becomes upon the death of the other entitled to the income of any settled property, Estate Duty shall not be payable on that property until the death of the survivor."

He asked the learned Solicitor General to answer these points and to give them something more than the mere determination, the ipse dixit of the Government, if he might use that expression, to go no further. He submitted that his proposal was most reasonable, and he hoped the learned Solicitor General would see his way to grant the point.

MR. R. T. REID said, he could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that he made no complaint of his putting the Amendment on the Paper. What he did was to put it to the Committee whether an Amendment of the kind should be accepted under the circumstances. He (Mr. R. T. Reid) had moved an extremely limited Amendment to apply to special cases applicable before the commencement of this Act, and he did so in compliance with a request made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) that a few cases already existing should be met. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Wight (Sir R. Webster) was entirely within his right, if he thought fit, to use his (Mr. R. T. Reid's) compliance as a peg on which to hang the entire question of the relationship between husband and wife. As he said, the hon. and learned Gentleman was perfectly entitled to do that, and he (Mr. R. T. Reid) had no right to complain, nor did he make complaint, but he said he had a right to put it to the Committee whether it was desirable to accept the Amendment. The point put to him now was that because he proposed to exempt certain marriage settlements he ought to exempt them, not merely on the death of the husband or the wife, but under any circumstances. He did not think that should be the breadth of the Amendment.

SIR R. WEBSTER: It is very limited, then?

MR. R. T. REID said, it might be; but at all events it was wide enough, and far wider than the limited Amendment he had proposed. It was a matter that had already been discussed several times in the course of this Committee, and decided in an adverse sense to the view the hon. and learned Gentleman took, and under those circumstances he asked the Committee not to accept it. No one disputed that his Amendment was applicable to the limited purpose for which it was intended, nor did anyone dispute that the words of the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight (Sir R. Webster) were applicable to the purpose he proposed, but the question was, whether it was desirable for the Committee to adopt the wider view?

SIR R. WEBSTER: How about the case where there is a settlor? He has not dealt with that.

MR. R. T. REID said, he had not the slightest intention of including that in this Amendment, and he never had. As he had pointed out, he was not asked to do so; the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) was a much more modest proposal. He should not deal with the case of the settlor—he might be wrong, but that was for the Committee to decide, and at present he did not see that the case arose.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) suggested that the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight (Sir R. Webster) would find it more convenient if he were to put down a new clause dealing with the whole question of settlements where husband and wife were concerned, instead of bringing it forward at this stage and upon an Amendment which only dealt with those cases where there had been a disposition taking effect before the passing of this Act.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I could not do it. It must be brought up here.

MR. DODD thought it would be better to raise the whole question by means of a new clause, instead of in this limited way.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) said, that, as he understood the proposal of the Government, if a husband and wife each brought £10,000 into the settlement, and enjoyed that during their lives, on the death of one the survivor would have to pay Estate Duty on the settled money. Suppose the husband died, had the wife to pay Estate Duty not only on her husband's money, but on her own £10,000, which she had brought into the settlement, as well? The survivor would have to pay duty on the whole of the settled estate. That seemed to him most unfair, and he strongly approved of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight. If Estate Duty was to be paid, it surely ought only to be paid on that part of the settlement money which the survivor had derived from the other party. The wife should not be compelled to pay Estate Duty on the money which she herself had brought into the settlement.

MR. R. T. REID said, it was in order to meet this very case that these words were introduced. The result was, that where husband and wife each brought £10,000 into settlement before the commencement of this part of the Act, settled jointly on both and afterwards on the survivor, if one or the other died the Estate Duty was not to be payable by the survivor on the money which he or she brought in. In regard to what happened subsequently to the passing of this Act, as he had already pointed out, it would be unnecessary to make provision for any property settled after the passing of the Act, because the same result could be achieved by a different mode of conveyancing. It was desired that existing settlements should be provided for, and the Amendment was to prevent what would otherwise be a grievance arising in these precise settlements.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, it was very difficult to follow these complicated questions unless one were not only a lawyer, but almost a Lord Chancellor; but it did seem to him that this Amendment did not carry out the intention the Solicitor General had announced. Take the case his hon. Friend had suggested of husband and wife each putting in £1,000 in settling a fund of £2,000. The survivor would take by survival, but it seemed to him that he would have to pay duty on the whole. What was suggested here was that he or she should not pay upon what was settled by him or her. But if both joined in settling the same fund and both took the whole fund by survivorship, were they going to halve the fund and say that duty should be paid on one and not on the other half? He did not think that was intended, and he could not conceive why the Government would not work on the line of the Succession Duty, this being purely a matter of succession. The old rules of the Succession Duty Act would absolutely meet the case, and they wanted no new rule. It was extremely dangerous for the Solicitor General to endeavour to meet, one by one, the little difficulties they brought up individually and leave the larger principle untouched. When a difficulty occurred to an individual Member of this House it was but an individual difficulty, and it might be a type of a large number of other difficulties which must be settled on principle, and not each particular difficulty as it arose. He thought the Solicitor General had somehow mixed himself up in the Succession Duty Act and got hold of the idea of the predecessor, which, of course, was entirely absent from the whole of this Act, but absolutely necessary to be remembered in matters affecting the Succession Duty. The whole Succession Duty turned upon ascertaining the predecessor—the original provider of the fund and the disposer thereof. He saw the idea of the predecessor here, because the survivor was not to pay duty if he or she settled the property on him or herself, but was to pay duty otherwise. In other words, it contemplated a man being his own predecessor, and being in no relationship to himself he would pay no duty. That was rather a mixed-up notion of the Succession Duty and Estate Duty. The Solicitor General said, there was no precedent in the law for any exemption of this kind, that was to say a devolution between husband and wife. There was in this very Bill. In Clause 4, Subsection 1, paragraph (c), it was provided that if there was only a life interest in settled property arising on the death of the deceased, or husband or wife of the deceased, the further Estate Duty should not be payable. There the principle was distinctly laid down that there was to be a different view taken of the matter from what would ordinarily be taken if, on the death of a person, the only life interest was that of the husband or wife of that person. It was true that in Clause 4 that was only carried to the extent of letting them off the further Estate Duty. But if it was good for that, it was also good for the Estate Duty. The principle was that husband and wife were one, and when the succession or legacy came from one to the other no Legacy or Succession Duty should be payable, any more than if there had been no legacy or succession at all. That was the principle, and even the Chancellor of the Exchequer had had to admit the principle to the extent of remitting, in the case supposed further Estate Duty, and his hon. and learned Friend below him (Sir R. Webster) proposed that the principle should be reinstated in its true position in the Death Duty system—that was to say, in the position that it should exempt the successor, husband or wife, from the payment of duty. Let him point out the unfairness of what they were doing in the Bill. They were absolutely merging and putting an end to all the 1 per cent. Legacy and Succession Duties. What was the effect of that? They were letting off from the Legacy and Succession Duty everybody who paid 1 per cent. and to that extent were relieving a large number of legatees and successors, but they were letting the widow off nothing. The widow paid nothing now, and when they merged what she paid and made her pay extra Estate Duty for it, they were taking something for nothing; but in the other cases they were taking something for something. In the case of the widow, they took an extra Estate Duty and let her take nothing. An enormous unfairness would arise in that case, and it was precisely in such instances that they should be most charitable in levying the Estate Duty. He was as stern as anybody when it was a question of tax collection, but he had a warm corner in his heart for the widow, much warmer than for the children. But the Government looked with absolute contempt and loathing on the widow and widower, and they maintained their exemption to the child. The Bill would work extremely unfairly unless some such Amendment as this were adopted. The capital exemption in all these duties had always been the exemption of the widow, and if they were going to do away with the exemption of the widow, they must absolutely do away with all other exemptions. He thought for all the reasons he had stated there were ample and sufficient grounds for pressing this Amendment of the Member for the Isle of Wight.

MR. GOSCHEN reminded the Committee that on the Second Reading of the Bill he called attention to the effect its provisions would have upon the relations between husband and wife, and he pointed out that to a degree quite unparalleled in their previous legislation the husband inheriting from the wife or the wife inheriting from the husband would be touched by the new duties. That struck him as one of the most important points they should have to call attention to during the proceedings of the Committee. The Solicitor General had stated he did not complain of the action of the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight in introducing this Amendment at this stage, but he thought it was a matter for the Committee whether it ought to be introduced and entertained. For his part, he looked upon any change in this direction as between husband and wife as so important that he thought his hon. and learned Friend was well advised to take every opportunity of urging this most important question on the notice of the Government. He was sure the Solicitor General would see that not only the late Attorney General (Sir R. Webster), but all of them on that (the Opposition) side were doing their duty when they called attention to this most important subject. The Solicitor General, he thought, did not attach sufficient importance to the point. After all, the Government in their new proposals did go beyond the old principle of the non-taxation of the wife inheriting from the husband or the husband inheriting from the wife, and why had they introduced this principle? They were driven to it by the extraordinary position they had taken up with regard to the Estate Duty. It was an attempt to make it the analogue to the Probate Duty, and yet, while doing so, to apply it to circumstances and property which were not touched by the Probate Duty at all. The settlements by husband and wife were not touched by the old Probate Duty; therefore, the husband inheriting from the wife or the wife inheriting from the husband under settlement was not touched by the Probate Duty. The Government now said they would sweep in this settled property, and make it liable to Estate Duty, but under totally different conditions from the Probate Duty, and it was the necessity to which they were driven by stating a very dangerous principle, which had landed them into these difficulties, for difficulties they were. The Solicitor General might not think it a difficulty, but they did, that the husband inheriting from the wife and the wife inheriting from the husband should have to pay the large Estate Duty in future. The hon. and learned Gentleman said he dealt with the difficulty as regarded past settlements, and then addressing himself to the point as to how it would affect future settlements, he said this: It was a matter of drafting, and by drafting settlements in a different way they might escape from this difficulty in future.

MR. R. T. REID: The difficulty would not arise.

MR. GOSCHEN asked, would that be avoidance or evasion? Here was the Government pointing out a method by which that which was their policy might be evaded, because they had not objected to the policy that the husband inheriting from the wife, or vice versa, was to be taxed. They had not said they wished to abolish such a system; they would not meet the Opposition in the slightest degree except as to past settlements. As to future settlements of that character, why not exempt them by some provision in the Bill rather than drive the poor layman into the hands of their solicitors with the request that they should draw their settlements in such a way as that they should not have to pay this duty? The Solicitor General said that in regard to future settlements the object aimed at could be carried out merely by altering the drafting. He submitted to the Government that if they did not wish to get the money which was paid under settlement by a wife inheriting from a husband or a husband inheriting from a wife they ought to say so directly by introducing words into the Bill which would carry out that object rather than to refer them to changes which might be made by their solicitors in drafting settlements. Let them agree to the principle, and they would then be better able to agree to the method for carrying it out. He wished he could feel that the Solicitor General and the Government generally accepted their views as to the inexpediency of making the wife who inherited from the husband or the husband who inherited from the wife pay this duty. If they knew the Government agreed that it was inexpedient they could discuss the best means of meeting the case. The Government, however, did not agree that it was inexpedient to impose this taxation, but at the same time they had been good enough to point out how that taxation could be evaded. He did not know whether the Solicitor General would think it necessary to reply, but he was putting the case exactly as it struck him without wishing to introduce any additional controversial subject, but merely with a view to elucidating what object they really ought to strive for in dealing with the relations of husband and wife.

MR. R. T. REID said, it was not the proposal of the Bill that husband or wife should be exempt from the payment of Estate Duty in the case where the one succeeded to the other; and in point of fact, under the Probate Duty, whether the whole property went to the husband or the wife, duty was payable just exactly in the same way as this would be payable. The right hon. Member for Bristol put a case to him in which husband and wife both settled £5,000, and according to the manner in which the marriage settlement was drafted both enjoyed the joint incomes during their lives, and upon the death of the one the entire income must go to the other. The right hon. Gentleman said that in such cases it was not fair that a wife succeeding to the income of the £5,000 which she herself had settled should have to pay Estate Duty upon that income. Though he did not think the result anticipated by the Member for Bristol would follow from the Bill, he (Mr. R. T. Reid) said he would bring forward an Amendment to meet the case, and this was the Amendment they had been discussing for an hour and a-half. He said then that he would propose an Amendment which would deal with existing settlements, and that it was not necessary to provide for future settlements, because by an alteration in the drafting it could be provided that each should have the life interest of the portion he or she provided, with, of course, remainder over, and they could produce practically the same effects without the difficulty raised by the right hon. Member for Bristol. It was perfectly unnecessary to have the clause at all except to deal with some cases of existing difficulty. But owing to the way in which some settlements were already framed it was necessary to prevent either husband or wife from having to pay Estate Duty on his or her own money. In future, however, it would be absolutely unnecessary, because any ordinary conveyancer or draftsman, in drawing a marriage settlement, would so draw it as to prevent, in the case of either husband or wife, whichever was the survivor, that property passing on the death of the deceased.

MR. BYRNE observed that, with the greatest possible respect to the Solicitor General, he was afraid he had not quite appreciated some of the difficulties that arose. At the outset, he (Mr. Byrne) desired to say he recognised the difficulty of dealing with a matter of this kind. They had first the fact that the clause was intended only to deal with settlements already in existence before the passing of the Act. They (the Opposition) thought that whatever provision of this kind was introduced with regard to existing settlements should also be introduced with regard to future settlements. He would tell the Committee the ordinary form of marriage settlement when money was settled by the wife and by the husband. In respect of the wife's property the husband was given the first life interest for reasons which were exceedingly important. They always settled the husband's property on the wife for life, and the wife's property personally on the husband, and there were grave and important reasons why this must be done if they wished to make a valid and effectual settlement. That was the first point, and he defied any conveyancer to say they could, by altering the form of the settlement, get rid of that in the future. It was absolutely impossible. If a man settled his own property he could not give himself a limited life interest, so that in case of alienation or bankruptcy it should be in the discretion of the trustee to provide for the wife and children. No conveyancer could alter that; it was the law of the land, and as long as the law remained as it was they must have that. The Solicitor General's argument, therefore, had no validity. They came to an entirely different question, and one which was a grave and important question in reference to these matters of settlement, and it was this: They were forced, by the view the Government took, to accept it that for the future marriage was no longer to be as it had been for hundreds of years in this country, and all over the world in almost every nationality—what was commonly called a valuable consideration. That was to say, as good as money and money's worth. But when they came to consider the question of settlement, where a wife or her father brought money into the settlement and the husband or his father brought money into the settlement, they were dealing with an entirely different state of affairs. Why was that not valuable consideration? Why was it not money or money's worth? He failed to see altogether. A man was entitled to an estate of £5,000 in realty; he was prepared to settle it on marriage, and to give the wife the first life interest, then himself the second life interest, and then to go to the children of the marriage. The wife's father, on the other hand, was prepared to bring in an equivalent amount and settle it first upon the husband, then upon the wife, and then upon the children. Why was not that to be valuable consideration? Surely everyone would admit that to be a valuable consideration? The object of the Amendment was to include such cases in the exemption.

MR. AMBROSE said, the principle of probate was that it was duty paid for services rendered, and there was no precedent in probate for the proposal to destroy the unity between husband and wife hitherto recognised in law, and make duty payable as between husband and wife.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) said that, as he understood the proposal of the Solicitor General, the object it would effect was this—that where there was brought into a joint settlement the property of two young people on marriage, the income of which was to go to the survivor, then, in the case of either the husband or the wife surviving, no duty was to be paid by that survivor on the property settled on him or her. But take this case. Two young people get married. The young man settled certain property, the income to go to the wife, and, of course, to come back to him in the case of the wife's death. On the other side the wife's friends settled on the wife a corresponding sum for her life, the income to go to the husband at her death. The object of the Amendment was to secure that the wife should not have to pay duty at the death of her husband upon the sum which had been settled by the husband.

MR. R. T. REID said, that under the clause the wife would not be required to pay Estate Duty on the income of property settled by her on her friends.

MR. JACKSON said, it was so ; but in a case where property, instead of being settled in the ordinary form of a marriage settlement, was given by the wife's friends to the husband, and afterwards settled by him, the wife would have to pay duty on the death of the husband. With every desire to give the Government credit for what they deemed to be a great concession, he could not see how that concession would carry out the desired object in a case where money was brought into settlement jointly.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) said, it was he who had first called attention to this matter at an early stage of the Bill, and he got from the Solicitor General a promise that he would deal with it. The point was whether a survivor should pay duty upon money settled by himself or herself, as the case might be. That point was met by the Amendment of the Solicitor General, and he thanked the hon. and learned Gentleman for it.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, the Solicitor General had contended that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight was not needed ; but the Solicitor General must excuse him if he preferred the legal authority of hon. and learned Gentlemen on his own side of the House. It was just as well, perhaps, after the highly technical and legal character of the discussion, that the Solicitor General should be, for one or two moments, confronted with the dry light of lay intelligence. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Wight appeared to him and his friends to be a plain, simple and obvious justice. How did the case appear to them ? A sum of money was settled by an outside party upon a man and wife jointly. The two were in this respect as one person. He was sorry to hear the Solicitor General deny that proposition. Such was the case in England, and he had also thought it was the case in Scotland. Well, money was left to the husband and wife jointly. It was impossible to distinguish whether it belonged to the wife or to the husband ; but it belonged to both jointly, and for this purpose what was his was hers and what was hers was his. If the wife died the husband simply came into his own. He did not take property from anyone else ; he simply retained his own. Similarly, if he died, the wife succeeded to her own property. Was it not a hard case that she should pay Estate Duty, not upon what she inherited from anyone else, but upon her own ? It was another instance of the harshness of the Bill in its application to widows. He could tell the Solicitor General that there was no thought that men in their lives felt so much as the thought that after their death their widows would be subjected to unjust taxation. He therefore strongly supported the Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 176 ; Noes 112.—(Division List, No. 127.)

Words added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 18.

SIR R. WEBSTER moved an Amendment providing that "settled property" should include property held upon the trusts of the settlement. He said that it was not an uncommon thing for property to be left with directions that it was to be held on the trusts of a settlement though not actually settled. It was to the interest of the Government that this Amendment should be made.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 10, after the word "in," to insert the words "or held upon the trusts of."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. T. REID said, that he did not think the words were necessary, but he would not object to them.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. W. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) moved to omit the words "or reversion" from the sentence in which it was included in "interest in expectancy." He said that the words were not necessary to the definition, and that they might do mischief. He pointed out that in every case of landlord and tenant the landlord had the reversion of the lease, otherwise he would have no right to recover his rent. In such cases the landlord was therefore the reversioner, and could not be said merely to have an "interest in expectancy." In order to insure the correct reading of the Bill, he trusted that this misleading expression would be omitted.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "or reversion."—(Mr. Ambrose.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. R. T. REID said, that after the very able opinion that had been expressed by his hon. and learned Friend, he would see that the suggestion he had made should be carefully considered. He hoped that assurance would be sufficient to induce the hon. and learned Member to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR R. WEBSTER moved as an Amendment that the expression "encumbrances" in the clause, which was defined as including "mortgages and terminable charges," should be taken as including—

"Every sum charged upon or raiseable out of any property whether as capital or an annuity under or by virtue of any mortgage, lien, or charge, whether perpetual or terminable, and whether created or arising under or by virtue of some statute, or in any other way."

This Amendment, he stated, had the approval of an eminent conveyancer, and, although it might possibly be open to improvement, it was, in his opinion, a far better definition of the expression "encumbrance" than that which the Government proposed.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 21, to leave out from the word "includes," to end of line 22, and insert—

"Every sum charged upon or raiseable out of any property whether as capital or an annuity under or by virtue of any mortgage, lien, or charge, whether perpetual or terminable, and whether created or arising under or by virtue of some statute, or in any other way."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. R. T. REID said, the hon. and learned Member appeared not to approve of the language of his own Amendment. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman felt some doubt as to the adequacy of his own definition.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that was not the case; he was only modest about the matter. The definition had been prepared by a most competent lawyer:

MR. R. T. REID said, that the Government had also had the assistance of very competent conveyancers. When there was a difference of opinion between conveyancers about the meaning of words he had always found it a good plan to adopt the shortest definition. On that principle he preferred the definition in the Bill, for it was certainly shorter than that proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman. He was sorry to have to say he could not accept the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. GRANT LAWSON moved an Amendment providing for the protection of the marriage portions of sons and daughters, and for their treatment as debts due from the parent's estate. It was a common thing, he explained, for fathers who were not inclined to take money out of their business to covenant with the trustees of their children's marriage settlements to pay so much money to them upon death. This money was a bonâ fide debt, the parent, of course, being bound to pay under the covenant. In fact, he doubted whether the sum settled could be considered as property passing on the death of the parent, because the right to the money was vested in the trustees as soon as the settlement was executed. If sums settled in this way were not protected as encumbrances, they would be taxed twice over if the son or daughter benefited by the settlement should happen to die before the parent. Another injustice would be perpetrated if the protection for which he asked were refused, for, although the money really belonged to the son or daughter, the rate of duty payable on the decease of the parent would be the rate of duty appropriate to his estate, and not that appropriate to the estate of the son or daughter. He might point out that if the parent chose to raise the money on mortgage and to pay the debt during his lifetime, no duty would be payable, because it would be an encumbrance on the value of the estate. Was it wise to compel the father in such a case to raise the money by an expensive mortgage at, perhaps, large interest, when he had already agreed that he would pay the money to his son or daughter, that was to say, that the money would pass to them on his death, and the right to the money having already passed to the trustees?

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 22, at end, to insert—

“And any sum which the deceased had covenanted to pay on or after his death to the trustees of any settlement made on the marriage of any of his issue.”—(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. R. T. REID said, that he presumed that the hon. Gentleman intended by his Amendment to indirectly provide that the property covenanted to be paid to trustees for the benefit of the children on the death of the father should not be deemed part of the estate passing on death. He did not think they could produce that effect in the present clause, as they had already described the property to be deducted. The Amendment ought to have been moved on Clause 6. If the hon. Gentleman desired to press his proposal, he had better do so on Clause 6 on the Report, but he warned the hon. Gentleman that the Government would feel bound to offer it a strenuous resistance, as it was contrary to the principle of the Bill. If the Amendment were adopted, a man would be able to enjoy his property all his life and then transfer it to his children on his death without paying Estate Duty.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that apart from the question the hon. and learned Member raised as to the place at which this Amendment should be moved and the legal question as to what view would be taken in a Court of Law in regard to the word “encumbrances,” there was one view of the Amendment which the hon. and learned Gentleman would remember he (Mr. Goschen) raised before. The Amendment as now moved might go too far. However, when a man covenanted to transfer property to trustees and to pay interest upon the capital until his death, that created a debt upon which the Estate Duty ought not to be payable. The Government had promised that the point should be considered. Such a covenant as he had referred to was clearly parting entirely with the money to the trustees, and creating a debt as distinct, as clearly enforceable, as clearly an indebtedness, as any other debt. He would renew the request to the Government to consider the point. The whole Committee must be anxious that a man in business, unable at the moment to withdraw his money, should be able to make a covenant with trustees to pay them a certain sum and to allow 4 per cent. interest until the debt was paid off.

Mr. Grant Lawson

MR. R. T. REID said, he understood that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had assented to the principle of the Amendment, or had at any rate consented to take it into consideration.

MR. GOSCHEN: Is the hon. and learned Gentleman not able to give any further assurance just now?

MR. R. T. REID: No. My right hon. Friend gave a promise, and doubtless that will be considered sufficient.

MR. COURTNEY said, the hon. Member who proposed the Amendment had gone much further than his own argument. He had dwelt upon a man covenanting to pay interest on a debt he had created during his lifetime. There was a distinction between a covenant to pay on death and a covenant to pay on which interest was to run. If exemption were to be allowed in the case of covenants to pay on death a man would be able to get rid of liability to pay Estate Duty in respect of all property that was ordinarily left by will. As to the Amendment, he agreed with the Solicitor General that if it were adopted here it would have no effect on Clause 6, which was what they were aiming at, and which had reference to debts or encumbrances for money or money's worth. They would not include encumbrances which, read on with Clause 6, would involve two parts of a sentence each contradicting the other.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, this point had been before the Government 10 days, and it must have been one of the points which the Government had reserved for discussion and on which some conclusion had been arrived at. Were the Government now prepared to state their views on the question? If a man covenanted on his daughter's marriage to pay her interest on a sum of money which was to go to her at his death, that was really parting with so much property. The point did not affect the owner of real or funded property so much as the man of business. The owner of real property could prevent property given away in this manner from being reckoned amongst his assets at his death, because the man of business could not do that conveniently. He did not think that the Committee ought to allow the Bill to drive more persons into making what had been described as hocus-pocus arrangements.

MR. R. T. REID said, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that some of the questions which had been reserved had been considered. There had been a great deal to do, but he hoped to be able to place nearly the whole of the Amendments on the Paper to-morrow. He would say no more than that. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, he thought, did not differ from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin that the Amendment would not be effective on the present clause.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, they were so much under the spell of the charm of manner of the Solicitor General that they sometimes felt that he did not argue with them and show them where they were wrong. When the Opposition framed Amendments they sometimes wished that the hon. Gentleman would tell them not only that they were wrong, but why they were wrong. He (Sir R. Webster) begged to move the omission of the following definition :—

"The expression 'property passing on the death' includes property passing either immediately on the death or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and the expression 'on the death' includes 'with reference to the death.'"

These words were wholly unnecessary, and if allowed to remain in the Bill would create a great deal of confusion. In the Bill, as reprinted, there was, in Section 2, a very full description of property passing on the death of the deceased, and of what it was to be deemed to include, and the statutory definition there set down was inconsistent with the definition in the present clause. When they looked at the origin of these words he thought the Committee would see that it was plain they were not applicable to the present Bill. The words were taken from Section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, and their object was to point out in what circumstances a person became entitled to succession. But no one, whether layman or lawyer, could find a meaning for these words in dealing with property passing on the death or passing from the predecessor. The conditions entirely changed. He could not help thinking that the draftsman, overwhelmed with work, had put in words from the Succession Duty Act, forgetting that the circumstances under which they appeared in the Act and in the Bill were different. The definition was inconsistent with Clause 2 of this Bill as it had been amended, and further it was inappropriate to the state of circumstances which the Bill contemplated.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 22, to leave out from the word "charges" to the word "the," in line 28.—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That the words from the word 'charges' to the word 'and,' in line 26, stand part of the Clause."

MR. R. T. REID was understood to say that he believed the words referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman were taken from the Succession Duty Act of 1853, and he could not see how they were inappropriate to the present Bill, or how they clashed with Clause 2 of that Bill. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES thought it was unnecessary to overload the Bill with Clause 18. The words in question were by no means apt. They were used in the Succession Duty Act with reference to an entirely different state of circumstances from that to which it was proposed to apply them in this Bill. They were used to define the disposition of property and the benefit thence arising. In this Finance Bill, however, they had nothing to do with the disposition of the property. What they had to do with was the property itself. Nor had they anything to do with the benefit arising from a disposition. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said he had nothing to do with legatees, but that he desired to touch the corpus of estates.

MR. HALDANE said, he thought the hon. Gentleman had taken advantage of the Succession Duty Act of 1853. The words there had reference to the disposition of property. The question with which they were dealing now was one of the devolution of property. Without the Definition Clause, he thought the words of the Act of 1853 would just as well apply.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, this Definition Clause seemed to him to be a mere réchauffé of choice morsels of the Act of 1853. They had had the Act of 1853 thrust down their throats all through these Debates; but if the quotations made from it were specimens of its style, he considered that it was neither clear nor beautiful. He had listened with great attention to the attempts made to defend it, and he confessed that they appeared to him to be deplorable failures. Hon. Members had struggled with tolerable success with two lines; but when they got beyond those, they commenced to stammer and to hesitate and to labour to defend the wording of the Act. Why, in the name of common sense, was it necessary, either in the interest of Judges, barristers, solicitors, or even of the deceased or anybody else, that the Act should be incumbered with all this weight of obscurity? He put it to the Committee whether anyone ever heard of such obscure phrases, which, whatever they might convey to the mind of a conveyancer, meant nothing to anybody else? Would it not be enough to speak simply of property passing at death, or after an interval, without any of the additional words? It passed comprehension why so much difference should be paid to the drafting of the Act of 1853.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 162 ; Nocs 120.—(Division List, No. 128.)

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES moved to omit the words in line 40, Sub-section 2—

“A person shall be deemed competent to dispose of property, if he has such an estate or interest therein, or such general power as would, if he were sui juris, enable him to dispose of the property, including a tenant in tail, whether in possession or not.”

He said there might be cases in which the person was not sui juris. He might be a lunatic or an infant, or there might be some other reason why he could not deal with property. They ought to know what relation this sub-section bore to Clause 4 of the Bill, and whether that clause would over-ride the sub-section? It seemed to him to be very absurd to put in these words “if he were sui juris.” The “person” might have a number of sons who might die before they became sui juris. This was a mere Definition Clause, which brought into the Bill a person who had never been seen there before.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 34, to leave out from the word “Act” to the word “the,” in line 40.—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out down to ‘the,’ in line 37, stand part of the Clause.”

MR. R. T. REID said, the objections raised by the hon. Member for Lynn Regis were covered by the clause, which was founded upon the existing law.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY said, he did not think there was any necessity to put in this restriction at all.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, it appeared to him that if, as the Solicitor General said, the clause only embodied the existing law, the words he proposed to leave out might be omitted with perfect safety.

MR. BYRNE said, the Amendment now under discussion was one of the most important that had yet been considered by the Committee. The fact was, that in an earlier clause of the Bill it was proposed that all property should be taxed of which a man at the time of his death was competent to dispose, and yet the Interpretation Clause included a great deal of property of which he was not competent to dispose. The latter part of the clause meant that if a man had a general power of appointment over property and he did not exercise it, it was to be treated as property of which, at the time of his death, he was competent to dispose. It was not fair or right that that should be included; and if they did not strike out these words, the clause would include a great many cases which he was sure were never meant to be included.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 135 ; Noes 95.—(Division List, No. 129.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the Committee were now approaching the end of the clauses relating to the Estate Duty. The next part of the Bill dealt with the Customs Duties, and was, therefore, also of great interest. He hoped it had been clearly understood that if Progress was reported now the Committee would come to a decision upon the important question arising under the second part of the Bill to-morrow night.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that, so far as he could make a forecast, he saw no reason why the remainder of Part I. of the Bill should not be disposed of by the dinner hour to-morrow. He thought they would then be able to come to a decision upon the Beer Duty; but he doubted whether they would be able also to dispose of the question of the Spirit Duty, which raised different issues.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he had hoped that the discussion on that important part of the Bill would be finished that evening.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he thought that they would be quite able, after disposing of the portion of the Bill that specially referred to Scotland to-morrow, also to finish the discussion on the Beer Duty, although they would not be able to dispose of the Spirit Duties. He might point out that, as the Scotch Members would have to attend the Standing Committee at 12 to-morrow, it would be unfair to bring on the Debate at so late an hour.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that, as the Scotch Members did not desire that the Debate should then be carried further, he would consent to Progress being reported.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

*SIR S. MONTAGU, who had the following Motion on the Paper, moved the adoption of the first paragraph—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether any and what changes in the present system of Weights and Measures should be adopted :

"That the Committee do consist of Seventeen Members :

That Mr. Barran, Mr. Burt, Mr. Crombie, Mr. Charles Fenwick, Mr. Alban Gibbs, Mr. Godson, Sir Edward Hill, Mr. Justin M'Carthy, Sir Samuel Montagu, Mr. Jasper More, Mr. Fletcher Moulton, Sir Albert Rollit, Sir Henry Roscoe, Mr. Stewart Wallace, Mr. Webster, Mr. Whiteley, and Mr. Wrightson, be Members of the Committee :

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records :

That Five be the quorum."

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he was surprised that the Government had given the House no information in reference to the proposal, and that they were allowing the Motion to be made without giving any indication as to the direction in which they would desire the Select Committee to proceed. This was a proposal made by a private Member of the House without the authority of the Government to inquire into an enormous subject, and it was made close upon the beginning of the month of July, when the House was in a state of extreme lassitude. Under these circumstances, he must object to the proposal.

SIR S. MONTAGU said, the proposal was simply that there should be an inquiry. There had been no inquiry on the subject for 30 odd years, and an investigation was desired by a great majority of Members and also by the Trades Unions.

An hon. MEMBER: I object.

EAST LONDON WATER BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH, before this and the two following Water Bills were read a second time, asked the Chairman of Committees whether it was quite a usual thing to read Bills of such importance at such short notice? These Bills were only read a third time and passed by the other House yesterday, and they were set down for Second Reading in their Lordships' House to-day. At another time he should like to call attention to the provisions of these Bills, but he would not, of course, intervene now before the important business which stood on the Paper. Seeing the short time that had elapsed since the Bills left the other House, it appeared to be not an inconvenient course to ask the noble Lord to postpone the Second Reading, though he had no intention to move that the Second Reading be negatived.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY) said, he would postpone the Second Reading of these Bills until Friday. It was, he admitted, rather rapid procedure to put them down to-day on the Paper, but the object was to get them in within the limit fixed for Second Reading.

To be read 2^a on Friday next.

ASSASSINATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Earl of ROSEBERRY), in moving,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to convey to Her Majesty the expression of the deep sorrow and indignation with which this House has learned the assassination of the President of the French Republic; and to pray Her Majesty that, in communicating her own sentiments on this deplorable event to the French Government, Her Majesty will also be graciously pleased to express on the part of this House their abhorrence of the crime, and their sympathy with the Government and People of France," said: My Lords, I do not think that any one of your Lordships can have opened your newspaper yesterday without an abiding sense of the vicissitudes of human affairs. There was, in the first place, the announcement, which has filled the whole Empire with joy and with hope, that in the third generation a direct heir in the male line had been born to perpetuate the traditions of the ancient Throne of England. In the next place, there was the narrative of the assassination of the chief of a great neighbouring State; and, lastly, there was the record of one of those catastrophes which cast the shadow of the carnage of war over the peaceful pursuits of industry, by which at one blow there were engulfed some 250 lives—lives each of them as dear to their own kith and kin as any President or Prince can be to his. I venture to think that so much of the mockery that broods over human life never was compressed into so short a space of time. My Lords, the assassination of the President of the French Republic is not a matter which concerns the French nation alone, for it is one of those events which overleap the boundaries which separate men into nations and go straight to the great human heart which beats alike in all countries and in all ranks. And I think this observation is true in a different sense, for the blow that laid the President low was struck by the hand of an Anarchist. We do not perhaps know as much as is to be known of that strange creed, but this at least we do know—that it spurns all divisions of men into nations, and considers itself above the pride of patriotism; and so we may feel certain that the President was assassinated by an Ishmaelite whose hand was against every man, and who thought to strike a blow at the very heart of the State by striking at its head. My Lords, in the late President we recognised—we who live outside his country—a pure and blameless patriot, who in times often of darkness and of difficulty so comported himself as to prove himself worthy of controlling the destinies of a great and free nation, and no praise can be higher than that. It is perfectly true that French people may feel to-day a more acute and personal sense of sorrow than we do, but I venture to say they have not a more sincere sense of calamity. To-day we purpose to send to them, through the medium of the beloved chief of our own State, our cordial and sincere sympathy on the untimely death of theirs. Well, my Lords, it would be vain to disguise that between the two nations, the one that is plunged in mourning and the one that condoles with the other, there have at various times been acute points of difference. With two proud and enterprising nations that touch each other all over the world it could not well be otherwise. But we have to recollect that for 80 years we have preserved peace between our two countries, and that during those 80 years we have stood shoulder to shoulder in war, a memory which, like the blood friendship of more barbarous nations, is not easily effaced. For my part, I can see no reason why that peace should ever be disturbed; indeed, with a little coolness on the part of those who lead States, with a little self-restraint in language, with a little more recollection of what is due to others as well as what is due to ourselves, the relations of all States might be almost indefinitely improved. Happy will the President be in the opportunity of his death if by his open grave the political Parties of his own country consent, if only for a moment, to hush their strife, and if even international complications may by that tomb abate some of their strenuousness! My Lords, I beg to move the Address of which I have given notice.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY :
My Lords, I rise to second with the greatest earnestness and sincerity the expression of our deep sympathy which the noble Lord in graceful language has proposed to your Lordships to utter. The dramatic and sudden character of the calamity would in any case have moved our sorrow and taught us on how light a thread hangs the strength of the strongest rulers. But in this case we have to mourn a man of singular merit, whose career has been now for many years the admiration of Europe. His dignity, his self-restraint, his spotless integrity, his unchallenged patriotism—all these virtues, brought to the maintenance of a part in itself most difficult, and made more difficult by the circumstances under which he assumed it, have secured for him, I am convinced, in the memory of the French people the position which they assign to the greatest patriots of their race. For us who, as the noble Lord has said, stand outside the circle at the grave, for us it is the loss of one who understood the duties not only of a French Ruler, but of a European statesman. It is the loss of one who, amid all the promptings of a sensitive and jealous patriotism, never forgot the tremendous responsibility that lay in his hands, and, added to all the other motives that should animate one in his position, a deep, sincere, enlightened love of peace. I have a right, perhaps more than others, to offer this tribute to his memory, for I was, for the greater part of his official career, in a position to know how much he contributed to the peaceful relations of the two Powers and of Europe. My Lords, I am glad the noble Earl glanced at the fact that the author of this deed, though an Italian, could not cast upon his own country even the slightest share of the disgrace attaching to what he has done. Our sympathy is due to the gallant Italians that they have even to repudiate such a suspicion. But we may well feel that the atrocious opinions that are professed by this sect sever them from the community of any nation with which they were naturally connected. It is a strange and terrible tale that we read yesterday morning, and I agree with the noble Lord in saying that we know little yet of the real opinions of this strange body, this strange sect of opinion—that we know little of their nature or of their origin. It is difficult to assign to them a purely political reason of action when we consider that of the four successful attempts to assassinate great potentates in our time one indeed was successful upon a monarch, the lamented Emperor of Russia, but three have been executed upon Presidents elected by universal suffrage. It is a very strange phenomenon of our time, and would lead us rather to believe that for some unknown reason we have reached a period like that of the acute political passion which marked the close of the 16th century and the beginning of the 17th. It is not without singularity that this terrible, remarkable crime has had no connection with those scientific discoveries which have been thought in many other instances to have facilitated and in some degree prompted the crimes that were carried out with their help. This crime was committed with the old weapon used by Ravailac, Clement, and Gerard. It represents no special or scientific facility; it represents none of the known divisions of political opinion; it is a mark of some strange madness which has taken hold of the more excited and irritable intellects of a half-educated class, and it is pregnant in the future with all the disturbance that must be due to the suspicion which it will create and the precautions of which it must necessarily be the parent. I earnestly join with the noble Earl in the aspiration that by the open grave of the President Parties may forget their bitterness and that a new era of reconciliation may await us. But we must not blind ourselves to the other possibility—that we may be entering upon an epoch of new dangers which will require from us and other nations a fresh display of those qualities by which Western civilisation has been maintained.

Moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to convey to Her Majesty the expression of the deep sorrow and indignation with which this House has learned the assassination of the President of the French Republic; and to pray Her Majesty that, in communicating her own sentiments on this deplorable event to the French Government, Her Majesty will also be graciously pleased to express on the part of this House their abhorrence of the crime, and their sympathy with the Government and People of France.”—(The Lord President (E. Rosebery).)

Motion agreed to, nemine dissentiente: Ordered, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION ACT (1880) AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW reminded their Lordships that the subject of this measure was before the House last Session. Its object was to extend the protection afforded to wild birds by the principal Act of 1850 in regard to certain eggs of rare species. The Bill, which came from the House of Commons last Session, was very considerably amended in their Lordships' House, both in Committee of the Whole House and in Standing Committee; but when it was referred again to the other House those Amendments were disagreed with, and, consequently, the Bill dropped. This Bill, as now introduced from the House of Commons, contained similar provisions to those inserted by this House last Session, in an alternative form to those previously proposed. As it now stood the Bill did not substantially differ from the measure which their Lordships sent back to the House of Commons in 1893, and he hoped they would now give it a Second Reading.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a.”
—(The Earl of Onslow.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

OUTDOOR RELIEF (FRIENDLY SOCIETIES) BILL.—(No. 88.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD WOLVERTON felt sure, in rising to address their Lordships for the first time, he should receive the indulgence which the House usually extended to those of its Members who were in that position, the more so as he intended to be very brief in his remarks, and as the Bill, which he was asking their Lordships to read a second time, had passed through the other House with the cordial consent of all Parties. He would refer particularly to three points in the Bill. In the first place, the powers given by it were absolutely permissive, no obligation whatever being imposed by it; secondly, the Bill would legalise an illegal course of proceeding now frequently adopted by Local Boards of Guardians; and, thirdly, it had received the sanction of no less than 2,500,000 adult members of the Friendly Societies of England alone. Upon that statement their Lordships would be inclined to listen patiently for a few minutes. As regarded the permissive part of the Bill, the last sentence (the only portion necessary to read) provided that in the case of a person meeting with an accident, and being a member of a Friendly Society the Board of Guardians need not take into consideration the amount which might be received by him from such Friendly Society. That, he imagined, was the whole gist of the Bill. He would put in illustration a case which might occur frequently. A man who had either met with an accident or was prevented by bodily illness from earning his weekly wage would go to his Friendly Society and would receive at the outside limit 10s. a week while he was ill. Of course, that would not be sufficient for him to live upon, and he would be obliged to go to the Board of Guardians for outdoor relief. It would apparently be a far better bargain for the ratepayers if the Board of Guardians were allowed to grant that man sufficient means by adding, say, 10s. more to the 10s. he was already receiving from his own industry, thrift, and forethought. Surely it would be better for the Board of Guardians to pay the man that sum for a month, and let him get well, than to pay him 2s. 6d. a week for perhaps three or six months. A man so applying to a Board of Guardians would know that he was going with extremely good credentials, and they so regarded them; and it was an absolute fact at the present time that those Local Bodies constantly contravened the rules and orders of the Local Government Board in this matter. That state of affairs would by this Bill be legalised, and Boards of Guardians in so doing would no longer be acting ultra vires. Not to detain the House longer, he would only add that, in his opinion, the measure would be an inducement to people to lead a thrifty life, and would give a higher position to those useful bodies the Friendly Societies, of whom their Lordships had always had so good an opinion.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Wolverton.)

*THE EARL OF STAMFORD said, it was no doubt an act of some temerity on his part to point out what appeared to him grave objections to a Bill which had received such cordial acceptance in another place, and which had been so ably defended by the noble Lord. But it was their Lordships' duty in that serener atmosphere to view things all round and to consider objections however unpopular such a course might be for the moment. First, he would point out that this Bill inaugurated an entirely new Poor Law policy, and gave legal recognition to an entirely fresh departure in Poor Law administration. In 1840 the Poor Law Commissioners in their Minute of that date and the Poor Law Board in a letter of 1870 gave weighty reasons for discouraging the very procedure permitted in the present Bill. The Bill introduced almost a new formula in Parliamentary language. "May not" and "shall not" were familiar, but "need not" was entirely new in a Bill of this kind. In 1874 the Friendly Societies' Commission reported as follows:—

"We think there can be no doubt that this view—namely, that the Guardians cannot but take into account the allowance granted by a Friendly Society in estimating the resources of the applicant and his family, as stated in the Minute of 1840, is not only legally correct, but is based on sound and politic principles, and that the entire system is but, in fact, a system of State aid to the members of Friendly Societies given in a form open to the gravest objections, as it practically leads to the conclusion that poor relief is the right of everyone, and that destitution is not a necessary element in the claim to it."

The principle of the present Poor Law was that every person had a right to have his absolute necessities relieved without regard to the circumstances. The duty of Boards of Guardians was simply to deal with destitution; that was to say, want of the bare necessities of life, and they had to take the means of doing so out of a fund raised in great part from the poor themselves. They had not the expenditure of a charitable fund voluntarily contributed, with which they might be liberal. Plainly, therefore, this Bill was introducing a new Poor Law policy by a side wind, without any thorough consideration of the whole object of the Poor Law system. Mr. Andrew Doyle, an experienced Poor Law Inspector, in his evidence before the Friendly Societies' Commission, stated that by enabling a person who is a member of a club to receive a greater amount of outdoor relief than one who is not

"you altogether destroy the discredit which may attach to pauperism, and hold out a direct inducement to people to join clubs, not for the advantage of the club, or for any other provident motive, but simply that they may become paupers on more favourable terms."

Then came a second objection—namely, why should one particular species of thrift be singled out for more favourable treatment? Why draw the line at Friendly Societies? Why not include a man who has money in a Savings Bank or Building Society? If Boards of Guardians were to be allowed to give relief to any man who had claims on grounds of thrift, endless claims would be set up, refusals would be almost impossible, and the rates would be enormously increased. He quoted in this connection within his own experience last year, soon after the works for the unemployed were started in various parts of London. A friend at the East End told him that many of his poorer friends had lately been borne below the line separating honest independence from pauperism, in consequence of the extra rates imposed in finding work for the unemployed. Then another consideration which should be borne in mind by the House was the great danger of weakening the sound Friendly Societies and of bolstering up the rotten Societies by this policy. In the most strictly administered Unions, like Bradfield and Brixworth, thrift and providence had greatly increased since the stricter policy had been adopted. And generally in Unions where the Guardians took into consideration, in applications for outdoor relief, the amount which the applicant received from his Friendly Society, the member was encouraged to keep off the rates. In that way sound Societies were strengthened and unsound ones weakened. As a matter of fact, few members of Friendly Societies applied for poor relief, and it had been calculated a few years ago that of indoor paupers only 1 in 1,000 had belonged to a registered Friendly Society. There were a number of weak Societies which did not exact a sufficient rate of premium, and therefore only gave inadequate allowances to their members. Lately the tendency of such Societies had been to disappear and of strong Societies to increase their strength. In that direction lay the hope for the future, for the failure of weak Societies acted as a direct discouragement to thrift among the working classes. The great Friendly Societies were able to make adequate allowances to men and their families in need, and could carry on their work perfectly well without such legislative interference as was contemplated in this Bill. It was sometimes said that the old Poor Law principles had fallen out of date; but they had been applied, and were now being applied, with great success in the case of able-bodied pauperism among men. The working classes would soon learnt the true effect of this policy, and reason and experience must prevail in the end—they never went out of date.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): My Lords, I think the House has reason to be obliged to the noble Earl who has just spoken for bringing before us considerations which must occur to anyone, on looking at the Bill, who has been connected with the administration of the Poor Law. If you look at this matter upon strict theoretical principles, I do not think this Bill is to be defended; but the fact is this—that in very many Unions it has been found impossible to observe the strict rule of the Poor Law, and to give no relief to those who derive benefits from Friendly Societies. For a long course of years the Local Government Board has found it absolutely necessary to overlook the illegality of this practice, which has been constant and systematic. With the full knowledge of the Local Government Board the Boards of Guardians have disobeyed the orders which have been issued. It is impossible to suppose that the whole of the Boards of Guardians in the country would be in a conspiracy to set aside this particular order without some reason. The reason is that if the law were strictly interpreted and assistance were refused to those who have funds—often a bare pittance—in a Benefit Society, Benefit Societies would be discouraged to such an extent that in the poor districts they may disappear altogether. That difficulty has been felt by persons who are not at all blind to the dangers of a lax administration of the Poor Law. The Bill is not a Government Bill; but I think that the House ought to understand the basis of it. It is better to give the Boards of Guardians a discretion than to leave their power to act, as they are doing at present, to stand with the deliberate knowledge of the Local Government Board. I admit it is contrary to strict principle; that theoretically it is not defensible; but in the administration of the Poor Law, above all things, it is necessary to look at things as they stand and to recognise that you cannot always draw a hard-and-fast line. I think, therefore, it is advisable, after so many years, to leave a discretion in the Boards of Guardians which they practically exercise now, and not to allow that practice to stand upon the deliberate negligence of the Local Government Board.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, though I will not venture to compare my experience in this matter with that of the noble Earl, it goes entirely in the same direction. In carrying out the law in this respect the difficulty has been very great. The noble Lord seems to derive great relief from the recital of his economic creed, and by accompanying his sin with a loud cry of peccavi. But it is quite unnecessary, I think, to proclaim so rigid a creed as that, because I believe that there are many cases where it has been found desirable to make some relaxation in the administration of the Poor Law, and especially in cases of infirmity or advanced old age. In my view, the thing should be done according to the circumstances of each case and according to the discretion of the Guardians. There are cases in which it ought to be done and others in which it ought not to be done, and the language ought to be quite clear that it is left absolutely to their discretion. I confess, moreover, that I should like to extend the discretion a step further. It has often occurred to my mind that a very hard rule has been made in the matter of small pensions. A man who has spent the vigorous years of his life in service, either public or private, gets a small pension in respect of his past services; and this fact is made a reason why the Guardians should not give him outdoor relief. On this account I have known pension-givers say to their old servants, "I will not give you a pension, because that would preclude your receiving relief if the necessity should arise, but I will make you a present once a week." That has been done in order to escape from the operation of this particular portion of the Poor Law. When we come into Committee I shall draw attention to this and one or two other matters, with the view of extending its operation to other cases besides those of Friendly Societies; but I think the purpose of the Bill, in spite of its sinning against rigid theoretical principles, justifies us, from our own experience, in going so far.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 26th June 1894.

QUESTIONS.

DESTITUTE CRIMEAN VETERANS.

MR. TANKERVILLE CHAMBERLAYNE (Southampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that there is living at 92, Marlborough Street, Dublin, an old Irish soldier named Donovan; that he served with the 8th Hussars in the Crimean War, and rode in the Balaclava Charge; that, after deducting 2s. 3d. per week for lodgings, he has 4s. 9d. left for food and clothing for himself and his wife; and that, his sight having failed, he cannot earn anything by work; and whether there is no fund from which an old soldier in such circumstances who has earned the gratitude of his country can be assisted?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): John Donovan served 12 years with the colours and was granted a pension of 1s. a day. This is the maximum sum which could be granted under the Royal Warrant, and there is no fund from which it can be increased.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport): Arising out of the answer, I should like to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners have a large accumulation of money unemployed, which was originally subscribed to meet such cases as this?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, Sir; but I understand that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners are of opinion that they hold no more money than is necessary to meet the possible demands that may be made upon the fund; and that the money is vested in them for widows and children and not for men who have been in actual service.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Can the right hon. Gentleman do nothing more for this man?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: There are no funds from which an increase of pension could be granted. He has the highest amount allowed under the Rules of the Service.

MR. KEARLEY: Do I understand that the Patriotic Commissioners have no power under Act of Parliament to meet such cases as this?

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll) asked whether the Commissioners expended the whole income derived from the capital of the fund upon widows and orphans?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: They would be very foolish if they did expend the whole of their funds. They have to keep a large sum in reserve to meet claims that may come upon them. The Report of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners for this year, which I will lay on the Table in a day or two, will explain their position.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Is it not high time a fund was created to meet cases like this?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is another question. Does the hon. Member propose that these cases should be met by grants of public money?

MR. BARTLEY: Out of some public fund. Men who rode in the Balaklava Charge ought not to be allowed to starve.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: There is a special fund, but no man is entitled to claim under it who has a full pension of 1s. a day. [Cries of "Oh!"]

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): Is there not a compassionate fund for Indian and Crimean soldiers?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, for men totally destitute, and the largest sum given out of that fund is 9d. a day. Donovan is already in receipt of 1s. per day.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that it was stated a year or two ago that no fewer than six of the men who took part in the Balaklava Charge were paupers in workhouses?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir; I am not aware of it.

COALING THE MEDITERRANEAN FLEET.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he can state the average quantity of coal kept in store at Malta and Gibraltar for use of the Mediterranean Fleet; and, in case of war breaking out, how long would this quantity of coal serve Her Majesty's Fleet in those waters without having to draw on supplies from England; and how much coal on an average does each battleship require in the Mediterranean Fleet to keep her fully supplied in case of war for, say, six months without drawing on England?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): Questions on this subject were asked on the 12th of September and the 28th of November last year. I have nothing to add to the answers then given—that it would be contrary to policy and practice to make statements as to the amount of coal at Gibraltar.

DISCHARGE OF BRITISH SEAMEN IN FOREIGN PORTS.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, with reference to the Report of the Departmental Committee in 1893, which, in order to mitigate crimping and other evils incident to the discharge of British seamen in foreign ports, recommended a system being tried in the Port of Dunkerque for the direct transmission to their homes of British seamen discharged in that port, and the payment to them of their wages after they had safely reached their homes, whether this experiment was to have been commenced on the 1st of January, 1894; and whether any, and, if so, what, steps have been taken to carry out an experiment in the best interests of British seamen?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): No date was fixed for carrying into effect the recommendation of the Departmental Committee referred to by the hon. Member. The scheme referred to in the question has my cordial sympathy, but a grant of public money is required before it can be tried at Dunkerque, or any other foreign port, and on this subject the Board of Trade are in communication with the Treasury.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: What amount would be required? Would it be a large sum?

MR. BRYCE: Not in the first instance, as it will only be experimental.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

CONTRACTS UNDER THE NEW NAVAL PROGRAMME.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is able to state the particulars and the amount of contract work incidental to the new Naval Programme placed with the various firms throughout the United Kingdom for ship construction and engines?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: As soon as the various contracts are complete we propose to present a Return.

*MR. KEIR-HARDIE: May I ask if any of the orders have been given to shipbuilding firms in the East End of London, and, if not, why not?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: My hon. Friend refers to firms on the Thames. I very much regret that their tenders were in every case so high that it was impossible to give them a contract.

*MR. KEIR-HARDIE: Is it not the case that one of the largest East End firms offered to make good the difference between their own estimate and the next on the list, so that by getting a contract they might find employment for their men?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Is the case of one firm a very unusual offer was made, but as it came too late we could not accept it.

IMPORTATION OF MACHINERY INTO CHINA.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that within the last few months the authorities of the Chinese Customs at Shanghai have, for the first time, been prohibiting the importation of any industrial machinery by foreign merchants which is worked by steam or which, in the opinion of the said authorities, endangers the lives or means of livelihood of the Chinese, and imposing a differential ad valorem duty of 5 per cent. on other industrial machinery if introduced by foreign as distinguished from Chinese merchants; and whether such action is in accordance with our Treaty rights in China; if not, what action, if any, has been or will be taken by Her Majesty's Representative in China to uphold our Treaty rights?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): Her Majesty's Government considers that the action of the Chinese Authorities in this matter is inconsistent with the Treaty rights of Foreign Powers in China. The question has formed the subject of discussion between the Tsungli Yamen and the Diplomatic Body at Peking, who have informed the Chinese Government that they cannot recognise the notification of the Shanghai Customs Authorities as in any way binding on foreign subjects.

THE "COSTA RICA PACKET."

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any further communication from the Netherlands Government in connection with the claim for compensation on behalf of the captain of the Costa Rica Packet has been received; if so, is there any objection to stating its purport, and what further steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take?

SIR E. GREY: Further communications have passed, but I am not yet in a position to make any new statement.

PENNY POSTAGE TO THE UNITED STATES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what was the approximate number of letters despatched from the United Kingdom to the United States of America last year; and what would be the loss to the Revenue (not allowing for increased correspondence) by reducing the rate of letter postage to the United States from 2½d. to 1d.?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): The number is roughly estimated at about 12,500,000. The loss to the Revenue by reducing the postage on that number of letters from 2½d. to 1d. the ½oz. would be about £78,000 a year. Allowing for increased correspondence, the loss would be much greater, as every additional letter would involve an additional loss.

INDIAN PENSIONS AND THE ESTATE DUTY.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether pensions and annuities, payable to widows and orphans under the various Indian Civil and Military funds and under the Provident Institutions in connection with the Government service, will be subject to Estate Duty under Section 2 (d) of the Finance Bill; and whether it is the intention of the Government to propose any Amendment to the section with the object of excepting these pensions from the provisions of the section?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The answer to the first question of the hon. Baronet is in the affirmative. In reply to the second question, I have to say that the matter is now under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURE ON RAILWAYS IN INDIA.

SIR W. WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will furnish a statement of all sums spent in the construction and maintenance of railways beyond the North-West Frontier of India, and in surveys of projected lines beyond such frontier; and a statement of all sums paid to tribesmen and their chiefs residing beyond the North-West Frontier of India by way of subsidy or remuneration in connection with these railways; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House Copies of all Agreements made with the Amir Abdurrahman since the 1st of July, 1880?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: In 1892, at the request of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, a statement was prepared at great labour and expense by the Government of India, showing the "expenditure incurred since the year 1882 out of the Revenues of India on the construction of railways and roads, on military expeditions and explorations, and on subsidies to native chiefs, beyond the West and North-West Frontiers of India."

That Return can be printed, if my hon. Friend will move for it; but I can give no later figures without referring to the Government of India. In answer to the second part of my hon. Friend's question, I can only reply as on a former occasion, that

"so soon as it can be done, consistently with the interests of the Public Service, I will cause the Papers concerning the recent agreement with the Amir of Afghanistan to be laid on the Table."

SIR W. WEDDERBURN: Would the right hon. Gentleman get a Return from the Government of India showing approximately the amount spent since the Return to which he refers was published?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I am at present endeavouring to prepare a Paper on Indian finance, similar to one I prepared on Imperial finance some time since, and that will show the expenditure under different heads. It will be laid on the Table very shortly, and if my hon. Friend desires anything supplementary to that I will try and obtain it.

WARRANT OFFICERS IN THE NAVY.

MR. KEARLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Admiralty have come to any decision with regard to the question of conceding to warrant officers of the Navy a higher rank and a material improvement of their status?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The Admiralty have under consideration the general question of the number and prospects of the warrant officers, but no decision has yet been come to.

TRANSFERS FROM THE ARMY TO THE RESERVE.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether 17,000 men were last year transferred from the Army to the Reserve Forces; whether 12,000 of these were transferred in the winter, of whom a large proportion should have been retained in the Army until the succeeding summer; whether he is aware that great hardship was thus inflicted upon the men; and whether he will take steps to prevent a recurrence?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: During the year ended on March 31 last, 16,859 men were transferred from the Army to the Reserve. Of these, 6,027 were transferred during the six summer months and 10,832 during the winter months, all of the latter, except 309, being transferred on completion of service with the colours. Men completing service are necessarily sent home from India during the cool months. They have to be discharged to the Reserve at once that recruits may be enlisted without the numbers voted by Parliament being exceeded. The winter season is also the most favourable for recruiting, and without vacancies recruiting cannot go on. Every effort is made to obtain employment for the men in anticipation of their discharge.

THE TRUCK ACT.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the action of Robert Price, timber merchant, Minsterley, Salop, who compels his employés, under pain of dismissal, to occupy cottages belonging to him at a higher rental than those obtainable in the neighbourhood ; and whether this constitutes an evasion of the Truck Act ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.) : The Act contains no protection against excessive rent. This being the state of the law, I have not thought it necessary to inquire into the facts of the case, but I must not be understood to express any opinion whether as a fact the rent is in this case excessive or whether the employés are compelled to occupy the cottages of their employer.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE : The point is, is it an evasion of the Truck Act for an employer to compel his men to live in his cottages ?

MR. ASQUITH : My answer is in the negative.

CUSTOMS BOATMEN.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether an increase of £25 has been added to the salary of 30 preventive officers in Her Majesty's Customs boatmen ; whether 80 boatmen have had an increase of £5 ; whether there are 303 preventive officers and 1,200 boatmen respectively ; and why the increase was not given to all the boatmen who perform the same duties ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) : The allowances referred to are paid respectively to preventive officers in charge of what are called "special re-rum-maging crews," and boatmen forming such crews. The allowances are not permanent, and are only granted so long as the officers are engaged upon this special work and evince special aptitude for it. Up to the present it has been found necessary to assign only 24 allowances of £25 to preventive officers, and 72 of £5 to boatmen. The special allowance was not given to all boatmen for the reason that they do not perform similar duties to those of the 72. There are 316 preventive officers and 1,138 boatmen.

BRITISH TRADE IN EGYPT.

MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helens) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the statistics given in an article in The Pall Mall Gazette of 21st June, by Sir William Marriott, on British Trade in Egypt are correct ; and whether also the statements made in the same article that, out of £4,800,000 spent from Egypt in railway plant and machinery, 15 per cent. only has come to Great Britain, whilst 70 per cent. has gone to France and Belgium, is correct ; and, if so, what is the explanation of this state of affairs ?

SIR E. GREY : The statistics appear to be substantially correct, as far as they go, though I cannot say whether 15 per cent. is the exact proportion of money spent from Egypt on railway plant and machinery which has come to Great Britain. In many instances the Egyptian Government appear to have prepared tenders for work of a cheaper description than that usually supplied by British firms.

THE GODLEY ESTATE, SOUTH LEITRIM.

MR. TULLY (Leitrim, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state if the Land Commission have inquired as to why the forms signed by 59 tenants on the Godley Estate, Carrigallen, South Leitrim, to purchase their farms in April, 1890, were not lodged by the vendor's solicitor till the October following ; is he aware that, owing to the action of the vendor's solicitor, 28 tenants were deprived of the advantages of the Ashbourne Act and obliged to buy under the Land Purchase Act of 1891 ; that one of them, John McCabe, of Crickeen, has been threatened within the last few months by the vendor's solicitor to have his sale upset if he will not surrender his rights to turbary ; and whether he can state what immediate steps the Land Commission are prepared to take to complete the sale of this estate to the tenants?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The Land Commission inform me that the proceedings in the case of the Godley estate were brought before the late Mr. Commissioner MacCarthy, and that there is no record of the grounds upon which he allowed the 59 agreements to be filed in October, 1890. The Commissioners state they are not aware of the circumstances under which any of the tenants who signed agreements under the Act of 1891 had been deprived, as is alleged, of the advantages under the Ashbourne Act. The Commissioners can only deal with the agreements lodged. The agreement in the case of John McCabe was lodged under the Ashbourne Act. A question has arisen in this case as to the right of turbary, but the Commissioners are not aware of any threat by the solicitor to upset the sale unless he surrenders his rights. The Commissioners have served notice on the vendor's solicitor requiring him to take immediate steps to close the outstanding cases.

REGISTRATION EXPENSES IN IRISH UNIONS.

MR. TULLY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) Whether he is aware that one of the rate collectors of the Tobercurry Union has commenced legal proceedings against the Guardians for the balance alleged to be due to him under the old scale of payment for his services in connection with the Registration Act last year; that in Boyle Union the Guardians had to go to the expense of getting legal advice, and were obliged to pay under the old scale, while in Mullingar Union the auditor surcharged the Guardians, and they were obliged to refund the money they paid under the old scale; (2) Whether he is aware that there have been several cases where the Local Government Board auditors surcharged the Guardians for paying under the old scale, while the Monaghan County Court Judge has decreed the Guardians for paying under the new scale; and (3) As all this confusion and expense to the Guardians individually as well as to the rates of the Union has arisen from the inability of the Local Government Board to explain the exact legal meaning of their own Orders to the Boards of Guardians, whether he is prepared to recommend that the Local Government Board should refund to the Guardians the amounts of the pecuniary losses to which they have been subjected in this matter in default of their taking immediate steps to have the decision of a competent legal tribunal on the points involved?

Mr. Tully

MR. J. MORLEY: (1) The facts are as stated in the first paragraph, except that the surcharge made against the Mullingar Guardians was not enforced, and they were not, therefore, called upon to refund the money. (2) As regards the second paragraph, surcharges were made, I am informed, in some instances, but the Local Government Board know of no case in which such surcharges have been enforced. (3) As stated in my reply to the hon. Gentleman's question of the 21st instant on the subject, the Local Government Board acted in the first instance on the advice of counsel, and when they found there was a difference of opinion as to the application of the new Order to payments for work done prior to its issue, they considered it best to let each Board of Guardians act on advice obtained by themselves. A decision of the Superior Courts could only be obtained if a Board of Guardians or their officers appealed against the ruling of a County Court Judge. The Local Government Board have no funds at their disposal out of which the Guardians' expenses could be defrayed as suggested.

THE IRISH SOCIETY'S ESTATES AT DERRY.

MR. MAINS (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Derry Corporation, having secured powers from the Irish Society, are about to evict Captain William Coppin, now over 90 years of age, from his holding; whether he is aware that although Captain Coppin has a leasehold interest to be renewed on expiry the Corporation have acquired from the Irish Society the grant of his holding for a scheme of baths and wash-houses, offering as compensation only a third of the purchase money of leased interest held by him; and whether, the Irish Society being guardians of a public trust, any inquiry will be made into the circumstances and conditions under which this eviction is to take place?

MR. J. MORLEY : I have received from the Secretary to the Irish Society a communication in which it is stated that upon the reversion of this property several years ago to the Society they found Captain Coppin in occupation of one of the houses, and that the Society allowed him to continue in occupation without payment of rent. It is not correct to say he has a "leasehold interest to be renewed on expiry." The Corporation of Derry have applied for a grant of the property for the erection of baths and washhouses, and the Irish Society, when granting the site for this purpose, stipulated specially that the Corporation should provide Captain Coppin with a free residence during his life.

THE OIL RIVERS PROTECTORATE AND THE ROYAL NIGER COMPANY.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, following the example of the Anglo-German Customs Union on the Gold Coast and Togoland, Her Majesty's Government will endeavour to promote a similar arrangement between the Oil Rivers Protectorate and the Royal Niger Company, by which the trade of the district is calculated to be materially benefited?

SIR E. GREY : The conditions of the Niger Protectorate and the Niger Coast Protectorate differ widely as to trade, facility of access, and the character of the populations. A Customs Union of the character indicated is not at present practicable.

ELECTIONS UNDER THE NEW LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in the Rules to be framed by the Board as to elections under "The Local Government Act, 1894," he will provide that in urban sanitary districts the Returning Officers, both for the election of Guardians within such districts and for the election of Urban District Councillors, shall be appointed by the Urban Sanitary Authority; and whether such Rules will apply to the appointment of Returning Officers for the first elections?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) : The appointment of Returning Officers for the first election will be provided for by the Rules which will be issued by the Local Government Board under Section 48 of the Local Government Act. The question raised by my hon. Friend, as I have previously stated, will be fully considered in connection with the preparation of the Regulations.

SIR R. PAGET (Somerset, Wells) : How soon will the new Rules be ready?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : I hope before long. They are now under consideration.

ACCIDENTS IN ROTTEN ROW.

MR. CUBITT (Surrey, Reigate) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the large number of accidents, many of them terminating fatally, which have lately occurred in Rotten Row; whether he is aware that the furious riding of a few persons is a great source of danger to others, especially during the hours of the day when the Row is most crowded; and whether, under these circumstances, he will take into consideration the necessity of enforcing more strictly the Regulation against furious riding, either by increasing the number of mounted police on duty there during certain hours, or by giving further instructions to the police, both mounted and on foot, already on duty?

MR. ASQUITH : I have received information from the Commissioner of Police stating that from January 1 to June 23 31 accidents happened to riders in Rotten Row, one of which terminated fatally. Three persons were more or less seriously injured, and of the remaining 27, who received slight injuries, 18 declined medical aid after being thrown from their horses, and subsequently rode away. Considering the large number of riders in Hyde Park at this season of the year, and (as I am informed) the inexperience and want of horsemanship of many of them, the number of accidents is not very great. Furious riding is not common, and is at once checked by the police, who during the past six months have summoned eight persons for that offence. The accidents given in the first part of my answer to the hon. Member's question were due either to horses having stumbled, reared, or become unmanageable; not one was the result of furious or reckless riding on the part of others. In the opinion of the Commissioner the Regulations are enforced with great judgment and discretion, and no further instructions or increase to the number of police employed on this duty are necessary.

MR. WILSON NOBLE (Hastings): May I ask whether the accidents in question are not in great measure due to the bad state in which the road is kept at present?

MR. ASQUITH: That is a question which should be addressed to the First Commissioner of Works.

RECRUITING FOR THE NAVY.

MR. CAYZER (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether recruiting for boys for the Navy has been commenced at Aberdeen for Her Majesty's ships Active, Calypso, Ruby, and Volage, belonging to the Training Squadron; and whether arrangements have been or are being made for similar recruiting at other ports; and, if so, whether Barrow-in-Furness is included in the list?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: There is no special recruiting for the ships of the Training Squadron. Nor have any arrangements for recruiting boys for the Navy been made at Aberdeen which are not equally in force at all the ports and recruiting centres of the United Kingdom.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the ports of Queenstown and Cork will be utilised as recruiting grounds for boys for the Navy?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I am happy to say that they will be utilised very shortly in the same way as other ports are being utilised. The Northampton has just been commissioned for the purpose of visiting several ports and enlisting boys between the ages of 16 years and nine months and 18 years, and those boys will be trained on board the Northampton.

Mr. Asquith

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether Belfast will be one of the ports so utilised?

MR. MAINS: Can he say also whether the Port of Derry will be included?

[No answer was given.]

WAGES OF CUSTOMS BOATMEN.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the majority of the Customs boatmen have received in payment of wages only £4 a month for May and June; and whether, as the 1st of July falls on a Sunday, he will so far mitigate the hardships entailed on these men by the mode of payment as to order the next quarterly balances to be paid on 28th or 29th June rather than on Monday 2nd July?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Customs boatmen, in common with all other officers serving in the Customs Department, receive monthly advances on their quarter's salary at the rate of 8 per cent. in even pounds on their annual salaries for each of the first two months of each quarter, and the balance after the termination of the quarter. The rates of monthly advance thus payable to boatmen are £4, £5, or £6, according to their rate of annual pay; and, as the majority in London are on the lower rates of pay, it has happened that the majority of the Customs boatmen have received advances of £4 for each of the months in question (May 1st, June 1st). It is a well-known rule of the Public Service that, when the first day of a month falls on a Sunday, payments of salary are not made until the following day. This rule is applicable alike to boatmen and all other persons serving in the Customs Department, and no question has been raised as to altering it.

VOLUNTEERS AND THE LONG SERVICE MEDAL.

SIR A. HICKMAN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will consider the propriety of giving the Long Service Medal to those Volunteers who have completed 20 years of service, but, being compulsorily retired, were not on the roll on the 1st of January, 1893; and whether, at any rate, he will consider the case of Colour Sergeant G. A.

Derrington, who was compulsorily retired in 1892, after being returned as efficient for 32 years, and who is retained by permission as an honorary member?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I can only refer the hon. Member to the answer which I have already given on this subject, and I need not say that individual exceptions cannot be made.

HOLYHEAD AND KINGSTOWN MAILS.

MR. W. KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he would state the number and weight of the mail bags carried between Holyhead and Kingstown in each of the following years—namely, 1853, 1863, 1873, 1883, and 1893 ; and the gross amount received by the Post Office since 1859 in respect of their half share of the passenger receipts by the mail steamers in excess of £35,000 a-year, for the several periods of 10 years ending in 1869, 1879, and 1889, and from 1889 to the end of 1893 ?

MR. A. MORLEY : The records of the Post Office do not enable me to answer the first question of the hon. Member as to the number and weight of the mail bags carried between Holyhead and Kingstown during the respective years mentioned. The half share of the passenger receipts by the mail steamers in excess of £35,000 a-year accruing to the Post Office under the contract has been as follows :—

Five years to 30th September, 1869 (the contract commencing on 1st October, 1860) ...	42,765	4	10
Ten years to 30th September, 1879	52,872	3	7
Ten years to 30th September, 1889	Nil.
Four years to 30th September, 1893	6,559	6	3
	£102,196	14	8

THE NEW IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

MR. W. KENNY : I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can state definitely when the conditions and specifications for tenders for the new mail service between Euston and Kingstown will be ready for publication ; and if he will lay a copy of the specifications and conditions upon the Table of the House, for the information of Members, before calling for tenders ?

MR. A. MORLEY : I hope not many days will elapse before the publication of the conditions of tender for the new mail service between Euston and Kingstown. I shall have no objection to lay copies of the forms and conditions of tender on the Table of the House simultaneously with their publication.

LIMERICK POSTAL AND TELEGRAPHIC STAFFS.

MR. W. KENNY : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the revision in the postal and telegraphic staffs of the Limerick Post Office, now for many months under consideration, has been carried out ; and, if so, with what results ; and, if not, will he say what is the cause of the delay, and when a definite conclusion is likely to be arrived at ?

MR. A. MORLEY : The revision of the postal and telegraphic staff at the Limerick Post Office is still under consideration, with a view to introducing more economical arrangements than have hitherto prevailed. It is hoped that a decision may soon be arrived at.

THE REGULATION OF QUARRIES.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in during the present Session a Bill to amend the law relating to the regulation of mines ?

MR. ASQUITH : I hope to introduce a short Bill bringing open quarries under the Metalliferous Mines Act and for other purposes incidental thereto.

ELECTION PROCEDURE.

SIR H. MEYSEY - THOMPSON (Stafford, Handsworth) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the subsection in the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act which directs that the Returning Officer shall provide for the preservation of the return and declarations sent him by an election agent ; that he shall allow them to be inspected by any person on payment of a fee of 1s. ; and that he shall provide copies thereof on payment of 2d. for every 72 words, applies to the return of the expenses charged by the Returning Officer ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, North Beds.): If the sub-section to which my hon. Friend refers is Sub-section (2) of Section 35 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, I may say that it is perfectly clear that it does not apply to the "return," or more correctly the "account," of the expenses charged by the Returning Officer.

EXPENDITURE ON THE NAVY.

LORD G. HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury by what authority a sum of £289,000, in excess of the statutory limit of £10,000,000 authorised by "The Naval Defence Act, 1889," has been issued by the Treasury towards the cost of building the contract ships sanctioned under that Act?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: No sum in excess of the statutory limit of £10,000,000 has been issued by the Treasury towards the cost of building the contract ships sanctioned under the Naval Defence Act. Under the Naval Defence Act (1) five instalments of the annuity of £1,428,571 8s. 6d., or £7,142,857 2s. 6d.; and (2) borrowed money to the amount of £3,146,000, making a total of £10,288,857 2s. 6d., have been paid into the Naval Defence Fund. The excess over £10,000,000—namely, £288,857, has not been issued to the Admiralty, but remains in the Naval Defence Fund. This sum would have been available towards paying off the loan of £3,146,000, but, it being proposed in the Finance Bill to discharge that loan from the Sinking Fund, the balance will fall into the Exchequer.

LORD G. HAMILTON: Am I to understand that the intention with regard to the £289,000 is contrary to law?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I do not know that it is contrary to law. The money has not been paid over to the Admiralty, and will in natural course of time fall into the Exchequer.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): Has the £289,000 not been taken in aid of the Navy Estimates of this year?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: No, it has not.

THE ACHILL EXTENSION RAILWAY.

LORD F. HAMILTON (Tyrone, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can explain what is the reason for the delay in opening the Achill Extension Railway; and whether, in view of the recent terrible calamity in Achill Sound, any prospects of a speedy opening of the line can be held out?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The delay is due to the fact that, the railway having been undertaken with a view to relief of distress, there was no opportunity of making prior engagements with an existing railway company for its construction and working, and it was not until quite recently that it was found possible, after prolonged negotiations, to come to an agreement with the Midland Great Western Company as to the conditions as regards construction on which they will be prepared to take over the line. The additional works required by the Company have been contracted for and should be completed by August 1.

LORD F. HAMILTON inquired if a considerable section of the line reaching from Mullaranny to a point opposite Achill was not already complete? Was the delay due to the action of the Midland Great Western Company?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: No, it is not quite complete. A number of stations have yet to be erected, and until that is done the line cannot be opened.

DR. R. AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): Were we not told some months ago that there were only two small stations to be erected? Was not a promise given that they would be completed in a month or two?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I may have made that statement, but I could not compel the Railway Company to carry it into effect.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Then this railway will be open for traffic immediately after the close of the summer tourist season?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I do not know that that season closes on the 1st of August. We shall not get our holidays there.

DR. R. AMBROSE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what was the date, according to the original contract, on which the Westport and Achill Railway should have been ready for traffic ; what were the conditions under which such contract was to be carried out ; did the Midland Railway Company receive any subsidy for working the line ; if so, how much ; and on what conditions did they receive such subsidy ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I should explain that the Westport and Mullaranny line is separate from the Achill extension. This last was commenced solely for the relief of distress ; there was no contract for completion possible until terms for future working were settled. These have only lately been concluded with the Midland Great Western Railway Company ; but the works have now been resumed, and it is hoped will be completed by August 1. The Midland Company receive no subsidy for working the line, but they receive the Achill extension itself, completed to their satisfaction, free of all charge.

THE IDENTIFICATION OF CRIMINALS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has decided to adopt in the Metropolitan and City Police Districts and in the Provinces the recommendations of the Committee appointed to inquire into the system of identifying criminals by measurement, invented by M. Bertillon, of Paris, and the fingerprint test of Mr. Francis Galton ; and, in such case, if, in order to facilitate research into the judicial antecedents of international criminals, the registers of measurements will be kept on the same plan as that adopted with such success in France, as also in other continental countries ?

MR. ASQUITH : The recommendations of the Committee have been adopted, including the recommendations as to the mode of keeping the register.

AMERICAN CATTLE SHIPS AND THE ESSEX FISHERIES.

MAJOR RASCH : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that American cattle ships are daily in the habit of discharging manure and rubbish east of Yantlet Creek and the Crowe Stone, in the estuary of the Thames, on the Kent and Essex fishery grounds, driving off the fish and destroying the nets ; and whether he can assist the Fishery Committees in stopping the nuisance ?

MR. BRYCE : No information has reached me as to the existence of the practice to which the hon. and gallant Member refers. I am advised that the Committee of the Kent and Essex Sea Fisheries District have ample power under their bye-law to deal with any offence of this nature.

EXPENSES OF MEMBERS OF FISHERY COMMITTEES.

MAJOR RASCH : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that cost of travelling and loss of time prevent fishermen from attending the meetings of Fishery Committees ; and whether he would issue a Circular to the Committees empowering the payment of the out-of-pocket expenses of the men ?

MR. BRYCE : It has frequently been suggested that the expenses incurred by fishery members of Local Fisheries Committees in attending meetings of those bodies should be repaid to them, but for this purpose legislation would be required. I have no power to authorise the Committee to pay such expenses in the manner indicated by the hon. and gallant Member.

THE PLAGUE IN HONG KONG.

MR. WEBSTER : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is in a position to state as to the present aspect of the Plague in Hong Kong ; and what steps have been taken by the authorities in that Colony to safeguard the sanitary condition of the inhabitants ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar) : We have not received any further telegraphic communication since that which a few days ago I communicated to the Press, but we are expecting to hear daily, and if the hon. Member will put down his question for Thursday I hope to be able to answer him.

MR. WEBSTER : Are the mails from Hong Kong fumigated ?

MR. S. BUXTON : That question should be addressed to the Postmaster General.

MR. WEBSTER : Then I will ask the Postmaster General ?

MR. A. MORLEY : I believe the arrangement is made by the Colonial Office.

LECARROW PETTY SESSIONAL BENCH.

DR. COMMINS (Cork Co., S.E.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the constitution and proceedings of the Petty Sessions at Lecarrow, in the County Roscommon ; whether he is aware that in that Petty Sessions district the number of Roman Catholic families is nearly 600, and the number of Roman Catholic Magistrates only one ; that the number of Protestant families is 11, and the number of Protestant Magistrates four ; and that the Resident Magistrate who occasionally presides there is also of the latter persuasion ; whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the Resident Magistrate, on the 13th instant, when presiding on the Bench, without provocation, addressed a complainant named Kelly in an offensive manner, and stigmatised him as a nuisance, although he had appeared only once before (about two years ago) in that Court during 12 years, and that on that occasion also the Stipendiary addressed him in an offensive manner and ordered him out of Court because he wore a beard ; whether there are several Roman Catholic gentlemen resident in the Division who are possessed of all the legal and other qualifications for the Bench ; and whether the Government propose to appoint any of them as Magistrates in pursuance of the Resolution of the House of the 5th of May, 1893 ?

MR. J. MORLEY : My attention had not previously been drawn to the constitution and proceedings of the Lecarrow Petty Sessions Court. There is no official record of the religious population of the district, but I believe it is the fact that the Resident Magistrate is a Protestant and that the three other Justices who attended the Petty Sessions during the year 1893 are also of the same persuasion. With regard to the third paragraph, it appears that Kelly is a man of very excitable temperament, and that on the occasion in question the Bench found it necessary to caution him because of his conduct in Court. But the Resident Magistrate denies having addressed Kelly in an offensive manner, or that he ever ordered him out of Court "because he wore a beard." The Lord Chancellor informs me that he has made a number of appointments to the Commission of the Peace in the County Roscommon, and that he is about to appoint two others.

THE CONVICT KELSALL.

MR. R O B Y (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether John Kelsall, sentenced to penal servitude in May, 1892, has applied for the appointment of an administrator of a sum of over £20, with a view to its being applied in aid of a prosecution of the principal witness against him for perjury ; and, if so, whether he has granted the application, or would be disposed to grant it if it should be made ?

MR. ASQUITH : No such application has been received at the Home Office. In the event of any such application being made, it will be duly considered on its merits.

COMMANDEERING IN THE TRANSVAAL.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is correct, as stated in the telegrams from South Africa, that British subjects in the Transvaal have within the last few days been forcibly commandeered and sent in prison waggons to fight in the Boer Army ; and, if so, what action Her Majesty's Government propose to take ? I beg also to ask the hon. Gentleman if he can inform the House as to the reply given by the Transvaal Government to the protest made by Her Majesty's Government against the commandeering of British subjects for military service in the Transvaal ?

MR. DARLING (Deptford) : also had on the Paper a question as follows : To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the South African Republic has lately violated Article 15 of the Convention concluded on the 27th of February, 1884, between Her Majesty and the South African Republic ; whether, at the time of concluding such Convention, Her Majesty was and still is Suzerain of the Transvaal ; whether under that Convention British subjects are liable to military service under a Foreign Republic; and whether the subjects of other Sovereigns than Her Majesty are by Treaty excused from such service?

MR. WEBSTER had given the following notice on the same subject: To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if, under the Convention of 1884 with the South African Republic, Her Majesty's Government still retained the suzerain power in the Transvaal; whether he is aware that, whilst negotiations are pending between the Government and the Boers, British subjects resident in the Transvaal are being forcibly impressed into the military forces of the Boer Republic, and sent as prisoners to the front; and whether such action will be permitted in regard to the personal liberty of the subjects of the suzerain power in the Transvaal?

MR. S. BUXTON: I informed the House yesterday that Sir H. Loch was now at Pretoria and in communication with President Krüger in regard to the whole subject of commandeering. He hopes to be able to arrive at a satisfactory arrangement, and under these circumstances it would be clearly inexpedient for Her Majesty's Government to make any statement at the present moment, and therefore I earnestly appeal to the hon. Gentlemen not to press these questions.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I must be allowed to remind the hon. Gentleman—"Order, order!" I may ask the hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that great anxiety is felt throughout the country in regard to the settlement of this question?

MR. S. BUXTON: I am aware of that fact, and it is on account of the importance of the matter that I am anxious that no question put in the House should complicate the situation.

MR. WEBSTER and MR. DARLING both intimated that they would postpone the questions in their respective names.

MINERAL RIGHTS IN WALES.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydfil): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether Her Majesty's Government have a duplicate or copy of the original grant made by Edward VI. to Sir William Herbert of certain manors and estates in South Wales, and particularly copies or duplicates of all schedules and particulars appended to forming portions of such grant; whether the minerals and quarries were specifically granted with the land; and, if not, whether the minerals passed to the grantee by the grant; whether Her Majesty's Government have duplicates or copies of all grants of land made by various Monarchs to various persons; and, if so, whether all such grants have in recent years been examined with a view of ascertaining what minerals or other rights were retained by or reserved to the Crown; and whether 9 Geo. III., c. 16, gives a title either to land or minerals after an undisturbed possession of 60 years in the absence of any other evidence of title except such possession?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): I answered these questions yesterday, and, in the opinion of experts, there is no such reservation.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Has the hon. and learned Gentleman seen an article published in The South Wales Daily News giving particulars which show that mines and quarries are reserved to the King?

*SIR J. RIGBY: I have not seen these particulars; but, in the opinion of experts, there is no reservation.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Having regard to the fact that this is the leading Liberal organ in the Principality, will the hon. and learned Gentleman examine the article, and will he be good enough to obtain particulars from the Record Office, as I say they show distinctly these mines are reserved?

*SIR J. RIGBY: Whatever any newspaper, Welsh or other, may say, I can only repeat that, in the opinion of experts, there is no such reservation. I will see if the particulars can be obtained, however.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Are the Government in possession of duplicates of these grants, and, if not, will they try to obtain them?

*SIR J. RIGBY: I cannot answer the first part of the question, because I do not know. I have already answered the second part.

THE COLONIES AND THE ESTATE DUTY.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has come to any agreement with the representatives of the Governments of our Colonies as to the Estate Duty; and whether he can now state what that agreement is?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I cannot state that I have arrived at any agreement with the representatives of the Colonies, but I have made to them proposals, the effect of which I have stated to the House, which I hope will have the effect of substantially removing their practical objections. I will put down the clause which we shall propose at once.

FOREIGN-MADE PAPER IN GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that, under date 26th April, 1894, tenders were invited by the Stationery Office for the supply this year of nearly 60,000 reams of paper, weighing from 6 lbs. to 400 lbs. per ream, and, although the Fair Contracts Resolution was printed on the face of the specification, with a note that all entrusted with contracts were expected to conform to its spirit and intention, no condition of British or Irish manufacture was added, and that in fact some 70 tons were placed with German agents of German paper makers; and if, in order to make the Resolution of the House a reality, stringent orders will be issued from the Treasury to every Government Department that Government contracts are to require that all goods capable of being made by the labour of the United Kingdom shall be so made, and that in every case the name, number, and exact address of the place of proposed manufacture shall be stated on every tender?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: No orders for paper are given by the Stationery Office except to firms located in the United Kingdom. I have no knowledge of the nationality of the individuals composing those firms, nor would an investigation into that matter serve any object, as it is well known that many English firms import paper made abroad. I have no power to limit purchases to articles made in the United Kingdom in the absence of a direction to that effect from Parliament.

Sir G. Baden-Powell

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT asked what was the use of the specification?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: There is a very great use, as a great proportion—some three-fourths—of the paper supplied is made in England.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that 70 tons of the paper was made in Germany?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am not able to say.

RAILWAY DEPARTMENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): In the absence of the hon. Member for South Roscommon, I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade how many officials are in the Railway Department of the Board of Trade; by what system are they appointed; how many of these officials are Irishmen; and will he take advantage of the new appointments of Sub-Inspectors of Railways to give Irishmen a representation in the Department?

MR. BRYCE: The officers and clerks attached to the Railway Department, some 19 in number, are on the establishment of the Civil Service. I have no knowledge whatever of their nationality; but if I may judge from the aptitude which Irishmen show for getting on in England, and from the abilities of these particular gentlemen, I should conclude that a large proportion must be Irish. There are several hundred applicants for the post of Sub-Inspector of Railways, some of whom are Irishmen. In the ultimate selection from this very large number it will be my duty to have regard to the fitness of the candidates for the post rather than to the portion of the United Kingdom to which they may respectively belong.

THE CONGO AGREEMENT.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any arrangement has been come to with the Governments of Germany and of France in regard to their respective objections to the Congo Agreement; and, if so, whether he will state the terms of such arrangement; and whether Papers on the subject will be immediately presented?

SIR E. GREY: A declaration has been signed at Brussels withdrawing Article III. of the Agreement. Communications on this subject are passing between Her Majesty's Government and that of Germany, and as soon as they are complete Papers will be presented at once. No arrangement has yet been come to with France.

NEW WRIT ISSUED.

For Sheffield (Attercliffe Division), v. The Hon. Bernard J. E. Coleridge, Chiltern Hundreds.

MOTION.

ASSASSINATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Mr. Speaker, in moving an Address to the Crown praying Her Majesty to convey to the Government and people of France the sentiments of horror and indignation with which this House regards the fearful crime which has been perpetrated upon the person of the Ruler of a great and friendly nation, I know that I am expressing the universal sentiment of this House and of this people. It has been well said, Sir, that of all British interests the greatest interest is that of peace, and the first condition of peace is the maintenance of the most cordial relations and the most friendly feeling of goodwill between this country and France. Since the close of the great war at the commencement of this century, nearly 80 years ago, we have been always the friends and sometimes the allies of France. That those relations of close amity may be for ever preserved is the foremost desire of every statesman and of every patriotic Englishman. It is natural therefore, Sir, that we should approach the people of France on this terrible event with a heartfelt expression of our deepest detestation of the crime and our sympathy with that nation. Sir, I think that is the case, in public as in private life, that the presence of a great disaster obliterates all thoughts of more trivial events and sweeps away all minor incidents which may have ruffled the surface of things. A great sorrow brings together the society of nations as it does the society of men. On occasions like this we have but one thought, and that is a desire to evince our feelings of sorrowful goodwill towards our great and friendly neighbour. We have witnessed with admiration and respect the fortitude, the resource, and the perseverance with which that brave and ingenious and indomitable people have repaired the consequences of an immense misfortune and vindicated for France the place it has always held among the first nations of the world. The Republic of France has now outlasted each of the systems of Government which have ruled in that country since the great convulsion at the end of the last century. It has shown by its stability the hold which it possesses on the confidence of its people. It has by its energy and resource restored its own affairs, and in its relation with other States it has maintained the dignity of a great people and preserved the priceless blessings of peace. Amongst those who have contributed to the great and noble work there is no one who has played a more illustrious part than the President who has just fallen by the hand of the assassin. No worthier representative of the great Republic, whether at home or abroad, could have been desired than was found in the person of M. Carnot. He has added fame to a famous name amongst the most notable in the annals of France. He leaves behind him the imperishable record of an exalted station and great duties bravely fulfilled. His private virtues illustrated his public worth. His dignity, his moderation, and his wisdom were made known to all men. He brought good to France, and in bringing good to France he brought good to the world. In moving that this House should express its abhorrence of the crime which has caused his death and its sorrow for the heavy loss which France has sustained, we have thought we could find no better form of words than those in which this House conveyed its sympathy to the great and kindred Republic of the United States on the occasion of the murder of President Lincoln. I beg leave to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey to Her Majesty the expression of the deep sorrow and indignation with which this House has learned the assassination of the President of the French Republic, and to pray Her Majesty that, in communicating

Her own sentiments on this deplorable event to the French Government, Her Majesty will also be graciously pleased to express on the part of this House their abhorrence of the crime and their sympathy with the Government and the People of France."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I might well leave this Resolution where it has been left by the Leader of the House, were it not perhaps desirable that I should add one word in order to emphasise the absolute unanimity with which this message of sympathy is sent by the British nation to the French nation. We have surrounded this message with all the formalities customary on such an occasion, but I hope, and I believe that those to whom it is sent will feel, that there lies behind it something more than a mere formal expression of our grief, and that we are speaking from the depths of our hearts. It is a national expression of a great national feeling. Sir, it is more than that. It is not merely the expression of the instinctive horror with which we have received the news of a great crime, nor the natural sympathy with which we have seen this great tragedy, nor our feelings for the loss of a great and patriotic citizen thus sustained by our near neighbours and friends. Sir, it is all this; but it is something more than this. It is the recognition of the community of interests and the brotherhood between the nations of the world, too often obscured by petty controversies and small causes; it is a proof that their sorrows are our sorrows; that their loss is our loss, and that this cruel and cowardly and this useless crime is not considered by us merely as an attack upon one particular member, however distinguished, of an alien Government, but it is a blow aimed at the interests of which all the nations of the world feel themselves to be the guardians in common. That the message sent with these feelings may be so understood by the French nation is my fervent hope and prayer; and in that spirit, Mr. Speaker, I beg to second the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey to Her Majesty the expression of the deep sorrow and indignation with which this House has learned the assassination of the President of the French Republic, and to pray Her Majesty that, in communicating Her own sentiments on this deplorable event to the French Government, Her Majesty will also be graciously pleased to express on the part of this House their abhorrence of the crime and their sympathy with the Government and People of France."

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (Longford, N.): I should not, Mr. Speaker, have added to the eloquent words which have been spoken on both sides of the House with regard to the terrible calamity which has befallen France but for one circumstance. Our feelings are all the same as to our regret at the loss of that great man—great by his very goodness—our horror at the crime and our sympathy with the nation deprived of his guidance and his inspiration. On these points we are all at one. There is only one common feeling amongst all parties in this House. But I do feel that the Irish National Party occupy a somewhat peculiar position, and that we are specially entitled and even called upon to speak words of sympathy with France. Everyone knows that the Irish people have been found for generations and centuries in sympathy with the people of France. We are proud to have contributed to the service of France some of the best and truest soldiers and statesmen France has ever had. One of the later predecessors of the lamented M. Carnot was an Irishman by descent and by feeling. Therefore, I think it would be in some degree peculiar if on this occasion the Irish Party were not represented. It is unnecessary for me to say more to show how sincerely we associate ourselves in this public, this national, this international expression of sympathy and sorrow.

Resolved, Nomine Contradictante, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey to Her Majesty the expression of the deep sorrow and indignation with which this House has learned the assassination of the President of the French Republic, and to pray Her Majesty that, in communicating Her own sentiments on this deplorable event to the French Government, Her Majesty will also be graciously pleased to express on the part of this House their abhorrence of the crime and their sympathy with the Government and People of France.—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.—(No. 190.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 25th June.]

[NINETEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 18.

MR. BYRNE (Essex, Walthamstow) moved, in page 12, line 36, to leave out from "if," to the end of Sub-section (a), and to insert

"he is absolutely entitled thereto either in possession, or expectancy, or having a general power to appoint property by will, if and so far as he has exercised such power, or if, being real estate, he is entitled thereto from an estate tail in possession or to a base fee continuing after his death."

He said there had been a slight discussion in reference to this matter in Clause 2, but it was then suggested that he should postpone further debate upon it until the present Interpretation Clause was reached. Clause 2 of the Bill purported to show what property was taxable, and the first part of the definition is the present clause provided that property of which the deceased was at the time of his death perfectly competent to dispose should be taxable. More was included in the words "competent to dispose" than would appear to an ordinary reader from the words themselves. The Interpretation Clause provided that if a man had such an estate or such power as would enable him, if he were sui juris to dispose of the property, including a tenant in tail, whether in possession or not, he should be deemed competent to dispose of the property. The object of his Amendment was to provide that a man should not be deemed competent to dispose of the property unless he was absolutely entitled to it either in possession or in expectancy. He had used as large words as he could to express the ordinary sense of what a man was competent to dispose of. He also proposed to include all property over which a man had general power to appoint, if he had exercised that power and not otherwise. Of course, to an ordinary lay mind it would seem a rather extravagant thing to make taxable property of which a man was merely competent to dispose. He submitted that it was not reasonable to regard as part of a man's taxable property that which he had not attempted to deal with in any way. His Amendment further provided that a man should be deemed competent to dispose of property if being real estate he was entitled to an estate tail in possession, or to a base fee continuing after his death. He thought it was not reasonable if a man was entitled only to a base fee which did not continue after his death, and the property on his death went to an entire stranger, that such property should be dealt with as if he were competent to dispose of it. His Amendment would omit from the clause the provision that a man should be considered to be competent to dispose of property, although he was not sui juris, if he would have been competent to dispose of it in the event of his having been of full age. He was glad to see that the Solicitor General had placed upon the Paper an Amendment which would exclude fiduciary powers from the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 36, to leave out from the word "if" to the end of Sub-section (a), and to insert the words

"he is absolutely entitled thereto either in possession, or expectancy, or having a general power to appoint property by will, if and so far as he has exercised such power, or if, being real estate, he is entitled thereto for an estate tail in possession or to a base fee continuing after his death."—(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out, as far as the word 'whether,' in line 39, stand, part of the Clause."

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar), who was indistinctly heard, was understood to say that the Amendment went a very long way indeed, and struck deep into the principle of the Bill. The Government had adopted the words "competent to dispose" as pointing to a matter which everyone could understand, and which was different from ownership. The first and most important subject of the Amendment was that of power of appointment. He really thought that an Amendment of such breadth and extent ought to have been brought forward on the second clause.

MR. BYRNE said, the Solicitor General had suggested to him when they were discussing the second clause that it would be more convenient to deal with the Amendment upon the Interpretation Clause, and he had therefore postponed it until now. He believed the Attorney General was not present when the second clause was discussed.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, his hon. and learned Friend was right, he believed, in supposing that he was not present. After all, however, his hon. and learned Friend, being a lawyer, must have known what "competent to dispose of" meant, and he did not think his hon. and learned Friend was free from blame in allowing words of that sort to pass on a sort of understanding that at a later period this Amendment would be moved. The Government had put the words objected to in the Bill because difficulties had been raised in the matter, and not that they really made any difference. The Government had been so often challenged to make their meaning clear that he thought they ought to be excused for endeavouring to do it in this case whether the words they had put in the Bill were absolutely necessary or not. The Government could not accept the Amendment.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University) said, he hoped that this Amendment, which seemed one of the most important on the Paper, would be discussed at greater length. The hon. and learned Member who moved the Amendment contended that they ought not to count as the property of the deceased that which he had in no sense received benefit from. His hon. and learned Friend would shut out property over which the deceased had had a general power of appointment, except so far as he had exercised it. If he had exercised it the property became his property, and it was right that it should be taxed; but it did seem extraordinary that they were to count as a man's property that which had never been his property, which he was given an election to make his property if he wished, but which, if he did not make that election, would go to a person who might be, and often was, a stranger to him. Supposing a man had a general power of appointment, and that during his life he released that power, would the property be looked upon as his, and be taxable at his death? So far as he (Mr. Carson) could see from the wording of the Bill, the man would be no longer competent to dispose of the property, having released the power of appointment, which was the only way he had of making the election to take the property. If in that way he could avoid having the property taxed as his property, and brought into aggregation, what was the difference in relation to this property between that and allowing it to go over in exactly the same way as if he had never exercised the release at all? It was reducing taxation to an absurdity to say that because a man did nothing they were to tax him as if the property were his, whereas, if he executed a deed declaring that he would do nothing, the property was not his, and should not be taxed? He submitted that the Government ought in all fairness to accept the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend, and should not leave these matters dependent on the absurdities of conveyancing, which eventually must give rise to a vast amount of litigation. The next point of the Amendment was this: his hon. Friend did not think that an estate tail in remainder for which the testator had never received benefit, and which by reason of its never having come into possession went over to a perfect stranger to the family, and therefore had never brought a shilling of interest, either to the deceased or any member of his family, should be taxed. To say that they were to tax the estate tail in remainder as a portion of the estate of the deceased, or to aggregate it with his property for the purpose of increasing the duty on that, was an absurdity in taxation. A base fee, when it became a base fee in possession, was a valuable property, but by the form of the Amendment it was conceded that such a base fee ought to be taxed and aggregated for taxation. But if a base fee never came into possession at all, and therefore had not been a property in the ordinary sense of the word which was of any use to a man or his family, how ought that to be taxed, or why should it be taxed? He thought they ought to consider whether they ought not to accept the Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 241; Noes 193.—(Division List, No. 130.)

MR. T. H. BOLTON moved, in page 12, line 39, to leave out "whether," and page 12, line 39, to leave out "or not." The Attorney General had said, with regard to a base fee, that it might last for all practical purposes as long as an ordinary fee simple. Of course, that was so, but it might also last a very short time, and it was therefore an interest of a very uncertain character. He suggested that while it might be an interest which might have to be taken into account for the purpose of paying duty, it was not such an interest as should be treated as property under the control of the person on whose death the duty became payable, property within his disposition, so as to be aggregated as to its value with the rest of the estate.

Sir J. Rigg

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 39, to leave out the word "whether," and page 12, line 39, to leave out the words "or not."—(Mr. T. H. Bolton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR J. RIGBY* was understood to say that if a tax were involved upon the estate, then in all probability the Estate Duty, irrespective of it, would be payable almost immediately, and therefore the relief would be inconsiderable in the case of a base fee from any point of view. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. R. T. REID moved, in page 12, line 43, at end, to insert—

"but exclusive of any power exercisable in a fiduciary capacity under a disposition not made by himself, or exercisable as tenant for life under 'The Settled Land Act, 1882,' or as mortgagee."

He said the Amendment was in compliance with a promise he had previously given, or an understanding which had been arrived at.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 19.

THE LORD ADVOCATE* (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.), on behalf of MR. R. T. REID, moved, in page 13, line 29, to leave out from "of a" to end of line, and insert "gross value not exceeding five hundred pounds." He said the object of the Amendment was to bring the Scotch provisions into line with those settled in regard to the English provisions, the necessity for that arising from the fact that the Customs and Inland Revenue Act had separate sections—applicable to the two countries—one 33 and the other 34.

Amendment proposed, in page 13, line 29, to leave out from "of a" to end of line, and insert the words "gross value not exceeding five hundred pounds."—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR C. PEARSON* (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) said, he desired to put a question which was raised by the Amendment. He was very glad indeed that the Government had seen their way to reduce the maximum estate from £1,000 to £500; but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the figure of £500 was in advance by £200 of the maximum obtaining at present, which, he thought, was £300. He obtained an answer a few days ago from the Secretary to the Treasury to a question he put on behalf of a very deserving class of officials in Scotland—namely, the Commissary clerks, who answered to the Registrars in England. Some Commissary clerks were still paid by fees and not by salary, and, he asked, if it should turn out that those fees were materially reduced under the operation of this Act, whether it would be competent for the Treasury to consider questions of compensation? The Secretary to the Treasury assured him that if a good case were made out the Treasury would give compensation. He would remind the Government that in a similar case which happened about 12 years ago it was found necessary on the part of the Treasury to obtain the necessary legislative powers to grant that compensation, and what he wanted to know was whether the Government did not intend to put down a new clause in the present Bill empowering the Treasury, in case an occasion was made out for that compensation, to grant it according to the usual scale? He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give a favourable answer; otherwise, if claims for compensation were made out, there would require to be fresh legislation next Session, which would, of course, always create more difficulty. He would suggest that a short clause on the lines of Section 12 of the Revenue Act of 1882 could be added to this Bill with great propriety. He looked to the Government to fulfil what was practically a pledge given to him by the Secretary to the Treasury, and he was sure such a clause as he had suggested would pass without any opposition.

MR. J. B. BALFOUR*: Whatever pledge my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury has given I am sure he will loyally fulfil. I was not present when he answered the question, but I will confer with him on the matter, and we shall see whether statutory powers are necessary to enable him to give effect to what he promised.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Will that be at the end of the Committee stage or at the beginning of the Report stage?

MR. J. B. BALFOUR: I am sorry that I am not in a position to answer that question. I did not know that this point was to be raised, otherwise I should have conferred with my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury in regard to it.

SIR C. PEARSON said, he did not mean that the Secretary to the Treasury gave any pledge that he would introduce legislation within the lines of this Bill; but if it turned out that such legislation was necessary to enable the Treasury to give compensation, he had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to take those powers in the present Bill while it was before the House.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 13, line 32, after the word "security," to insert the words "or other debt, payment, or prestation secured upon heritage."—(Mr. Graham Murray.)

MR. J. B. BALFOUR suggested the omission of the word "prestation," and the Government would then accept the Amendment.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY assented.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY moved, in page 14, line 1, to leave out from "settled property," to end of line 2, and insert—

"Shall mean property, whether heritable or movable, the title to which is by any disposition, will, deed of entail, settlement, or other deed given to any persons in succession, whether by way of life rent, or life rents and fee, or by way of substitution."

This Amendment, he said, raised a very important question, and as what he conceived to be a national grievance would be constituted if the Bill were allowed to stand as it was, he hoped that he should have the support of all the Scotch Members. The point with which it dealt was one which was really capable of being made intelligible, even to the dry light of the unprofessional intellect, because although, no doubt, it was wrapped up to a certain extent in technical phraseology, it had entirely to do with the exemption which was given by the Bill under the clause which dealt with the payment of 1 per cent. for settlements. The scheme of the Bill which was embodied in Clause 4 was that where they paid an additional 1 per cent. duty, besides the Estate Duty for a settlement, that settlement during the course of the settlement should be enfranchised and should not have to pay the full Estate Duty again until the property passed to somebody who was really competent to dispose of it. That had been, with one slight exception, successfully carried out as regarded the English portion of the Bill, and all he wanted was fair and equal treatment to Scotland in this matter. There was always a certain disadvantage from the Scotch point of view in proceeding in a Bill like this, making substantive propositions couched in English law phraseology and then proceeding afterwards by means of one Clause and applying them to Scotland because very often they found the form had a very awkward effect on the substance. So far as the form was concerned, the two systems of land rights in the two countries were completely different. In 1848 the Scotch law was assimilated to that in England, and whilst in Scotland they could do exactly what they could in England and no more, at the same time the forms of conveyancing were perfectly different. He proceeded to the application of it in the Bill. This privilege he had spoken of in the 4th clause was given in the case of settled property, and when they came to the Definition Clause they had disposed of, having to do with England, they found that settled property meant property comprised in the settlement, and they found that the expression "settlement" meant any instrument whether relating to real or personal property which was a settlement within the meaning of Section 2 of the Settled Land Act of 1882. In other words, they had given a statutory definition couched in English phraseology, in an English Act, which had no application to Scotland, and which, if they took it as it ran, could have no application to Scotland, because abounding in phraseology which was entirely foreign to Scotch conveyancing and Scotch legal notions ; and accordingly they approached this subject with the fact that settled property had no technical meaning in Scotland. If they did not look at it in a technical way, but according to the ordinary English language, it was difficult to know what settled property meant. As, however, they were professing to use technical language in the definition, it made it first of all necessary to give a definition. The draftsman of the Bill, on the other hand, had proceeded in a curious way, because he had not proceeded to define what settled property meant for Scotland, although that expression, as a legal phrase, had no meaning at all. But he had proceeded to tell them what it was not. It was not an easy method of definition to define a method of exclusion, but he told them that settled property should not include property held under entail. Speaking roughly, if they took the majority of the large Scotch landed estates, these estates were held under entail. The Bill proposed not to allow settled property to apply to property held under entail. He said that was a very great grievance, because what was the result ? Take the ordinary case of a man providing for his own family. Suppose he had four sons and an estate in England and Scotland. He knew an hon. Member sitting behind him who had a Scotch and an English estate. He would desire to settle these two estates in exactly the same manner, and if they left the law as it was the same thing would happen. But settle one in the proper phraseology of Scotch conveyancing and the other according to English conveyancing, and although the result as to succession would be exactly the same, the result of the Bill and the payments that would have to be made would be absolutely different. What would happen would be this. The father, A, had four sons, B, C, D, and E. He wished the eldest son to succeed first and the other brothers to come in turn. Suppose the father died, that B, C, and D died before they arrived at the age of 21, and that E eventually succeeded. In England, of course, the original Estate Duty of 1 per cent. would be paid on the death of the father, A, and no other payment would be made on the succession of C to B, and D to C, and E to D. But in the Scotch phraseology there would be duty to be paid on every one of these successions. He said that was outrageous. There was a technical answer to be made, which was that a Scotch entailed proprietor was competent to dispose because in the eyes of the law a Scotch entailed proprietor was a fiar. [Mr. J. B. BALFOUR : Hear, hear !] He thought that would be the answer given. He knew quite well that in the eyes of the law a Scottish proprietor was a fiar, which meant the equivalent of owner of the land, and that he might do what he liked with it. But if he did what he liked with it first of all he lost it, and the thing he had done was allowed by law. That was exactly the position of the Scottish entailed proprietor. The law said he could do as he liked with his own, that it would allow what he had done, so that the purchaser for value should not take ; and, secondly, for having done what the law allowed he forfeited the property. To tell a man he was a fiar was not, therefore, much good, and what they should like to get at was the real substance of the matter. Although a Scottish entailed proprietor was a fiar, he was not competent to dispose of the property in the sense that those who did not understand the law, but who understood English, would suppose. It was quite true he could get an estate into his own possession, but how ? By paying for it. He had to buy out the next interests. If there were three next heirs—which would be a typical case—he had to buy out these three heirs. What was left ? His own interest, which was practically his life interest ; and yet in the same breath the Government said, “Oh, if there is a life interest we agree that is a perfectly proper application of the principle of settlements, and we shall not charge.” That was the English case. In the English case the settlement clause applied, and in the case he had put of a family they had not to pay a new Estate Duty upon each of these transmissions, because these various children who had died only took a life interest. For all practical purposes it was clear that all that a Scottish entailed proprietor could get was his life interest. Everything else went to somebody else because he could only get the estate into his own hands on condition that he should pay out to these men all that they would have got out of the estate if they had come after him; therefore, how could they on technical grounds or anything of that sort support this gross injustice between the treatment of the two nations? It might be said that they could avoid this by settling their property not by way of entail, but by life rent and fee. That was open to two objections. In the first place they would be committing a great injustice upon the present owners of entail in Scotland, and in the second place they could not alter all of a sudden the system of conveyancing. Persons who died long ago did not know of this Budget Bill, and they settled their estates according to the ordinary conveyancing practice of the day. A typical class of settlements in an English family where there were more sons than one was to give the sons a life interest and make tenants in tail of the issue of these sons. Just in the same way in Scotland the vast majority of the estates were settled by entail, therefore if this Amendment were not accepted a cruel injustice would be perpetrated on the present members who were under these settlements. But that was not all. If by refusing to accept this Amendment they forced people to get changing settlements and put them in the way of life rent and fee, they would really upset the work they had been doing since 1848 and the very useful Act passed by his right hon. Friend since he had been in this House. For years and years they had been working in Scotland as regarded heirs of entail to give them full powers to do everything they could with their estates in the way of charging for improvements, providing for their widows and children, bringing their estates into the market, and allowing free dealings in the way of doing all these things which they had been doing in England, and had been enabled to do by legislation which had its termination in Lord Cairns' Act. But the moment they got in the position of life rent and fee their hands were tied tightly, and they would be prevented from doing any one of these things or from doing anything in order to make the land be of the greatest benefit to the community at large. As regarded the phraseology of the Amendment, he was not particular as to that, but he desired that the heir of entail in Scotland should be practically in the same position as the person was in England at the present moment under the ordinary

Mr. Graham Murray

English settlement. He pressed this Amendment on the grounds of justice, and he hoped the Government would accept it.

Amendment proposed, in page 14, line 1, to leave out from the words "settled property," to the end of line 2, and insert the words—

"Shall mean property, whether heritable or movable, the title to which is by any disposition, will, deed of entail, settlement, or other deed given to any persons in succession, whether by way of life rent, or life rents and fee, or by way of substitution."—(Mr. Graham Murray.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, his hon. and learned Friend began by observing that the Bill as it stood would amount to the introduction of a national grievance. In regard to that, he could only say he should be one of the first to help to remove a national grievance if it existed, and one of the last to be any party to introducing one. He need say no more to satisfy the House that, in the judgment of the Government at all events, this clause was not deserving of that description. He entirely agreed with his hon. and learned Friend that the aim should be to give equal treatment to the two countries in regard to this matter. That certainly had been their aim in passing this part of the Bill. They had had repeated conferences with a view to accomplishing this between the Law Officers of England and Scotland and the highly skilled officials who administered the law applicable to both countries, and what was found in this part of the Bill was the outcome of the careful consideration given to the question at these conferences. Whilst his hon. and learned Friend had anticipated one of the answers he should give to the argument which he had advanced, he entirely disclaimed the suggestion that either that or any answer which he would offer could with any accuracy be described as a technical answer. This was not a matter of technicality depending on considerations of form as distinguished from substance, and he quite assented to the view that what ought to be done should be to bring about equality of treatment in substance, and not merely as matter of technical conveyancing. There was no difference between them as to what ought to be the governing principle in dealing with this important question; and, guided by that principle, the Government had decided to deal with the question in the manner proposed in the Bill. His hon. and learned Friend had pointed out, quite accurately, the difference between the English and Scotch law in regard to this question, and it was exactly in the difference between the nature of the rights given by entails in England and Scotland respectively that the solution of the question would be found. His hon. and learned Friend said that according to the English law of conveyancing a number of estates were carved out of one property; they created a number of interests which together made up the whole estate. But the Scotch heir of entail was a full and unlimited fiar. He had not merely a fragment of a property that was cut up into different estates; he was the full fiar or proprietor; and, indeed, if the Scotch heir of entail had had only a fragment of the estate instead of the whole of it he agreed that he ought to be treated differently from the way in which he was treated in the Bill. There was another argument which he regarded as a very crucial one, as giving the key to the mode in which the Government had dealt with this question, and that was that the Scotch heir of entail had the full power of disposition. The proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Buteshire was based on the assumption that the Scotch heir of entail had not the power to dispose. But the Scotch heir of entail had got the power to dispose; he did not need the consent of anyone to dispose, and if the Amendment were accepted he would be treated in a way that no one in England having a similar power would be treated. That was a matter which had been decided in the House of Lords in a case of Legacy Duty since the Bill had been brought in. The Lords decided that where a Scotch heir of entail had exercised the power of disentailing entailed money, and paid large sums to his sons as the value of their expectancies, because their consents were forced, he was nevertheless bound to pay duty on the whole estate, without even getting any deduction or allowance in respect of the sums paid to his sons. The reason of that decision was that the Scotch heir of entail had an estate of inheritance; and it was satisfactory for the Government to find that the view upon which the Bill was framed had been recognised to be the right view by the highest legal tribunal in the land.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.) said, there was always a certain relief in turning from one uncomfortable position to another uncomfortable position; and therefore the change from the technicalities of English law and English conveyancing to the technicalities of Scottish law and Scottish conveyancing would be welcomed by the Committee. He was glad to see that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had come into the House, because the case which had been raised by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Buteshire in an extremely clear and able speech was one in which the right hon. Gentleman would see that there was a substantial grievance to be dealt with; and if it were not dealt with now it must be raised on the Report stage. In what did the grievance lie? He had collected his facts impartially from two excellent sources. Both learned Gentlemen who had spoken on the subject were agreed that where a man had the absolute disposition of the property which he had inherited, by being the last in an entail in Scotland, and therefore being in a position corresponding to a remainder in England, that that was a case in which, as in the case of a remainder in England, Estate Duty was properly paid when the man died. But what the learned Gentleman did not agree upon was the case of an owner of an entailed estate in Scotland, who though he might be said to have control over the successions of that estate, only got that control by paying for it. The Lord Advocate contended that such an owner was in the same position as the owner of a fee simple in England, and that he ought not to be treated as the hon. and learned Member for Buteshire thought he should be treated, as if he held under a life settlement in England. No one could doubt the side on which the real equity of the case lay. The process of settlement—he used the word “settlement,” though it was not strictly accurate in Scotland—was the same, in England and Scotland, to carry out the same object—namely, to keep the property in the family, though by the developments of two different systems of law it had taken in each country a different shape; and what they contended was that it was not fair to prevent Scotchmen from having the same privilege under their system of settlement as Englishmen enjoyed under their system of settlement. The only reason advanced on behalf of the Government for the refusal to extend those privileges to Scotland was that as the Scotchman could get control of the successions under the settlement by paying for that control he was in a different position from his English brother. But suppose they made an alteration in the English law by which the owner of a life estate in a property under settlement could absolutely buy the interests of others under the same settlement by money given, would the estate not be then as much under settlement as it was now? Clearly it would. The successions of the estate could be altered in such a case, but they could only be altered by the man paying away to the successors of life interests in the estate the amounts of their shares in the property. He maintained there was no difference whatever in the two cases. When his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Buteshire brought before the Committee the example of a man with two or three sons, and with estates in Scotland and England, showing that though the man had precisely the same object with regard to the estates, though carried out in two different ways, because the estates were in two different countries, the two estates were accorded different treatment under the Bill, that example ought to have been sufficient to drive the Government to make the concession asked for. He had had occasion to point out more than once that one of the objections to the Bill was that it would drive land in England into settlements, because only by settlements could protection be given to any estate from being mulcted heavily by a rapid succession of deaths in the family who owned the property. If that would be an evil in England it would be a double evil in Scotland. The Bill would drive every owner of realty or personalty in Scotland who desired to prevent injustice by having to pay Succession Duty several times over in the course of a few years to settle. But the owner in Scotland would not settle by way of Scotch entail; he would be driven to a settlement by life rents and fee, which was a form of settlement so strictly drawn, so little touched by recent legal reforms, and which were of a character that so bound the life owner of the property, that great hardship would be inflicted on the owner of property, and on all who were dependent on him, and the whole course of our legislation would be reversed in regard to Scotch property. That was a practical evil, and he trusted that the Government would prevent it by carrying out the principle laid down in the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. HALDANE (Haddington) said, the House had learned to admire the versatility of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition. Whatever the subject—whether it was the system of jurisprudence in England, whether it was the mystery of Scotch entail, or whether it was a discussion on Socialism outside the House—the right hon. Gentleman passed from topic to topic with a facility and a power and a grasp of dry technicalities that amazed everyone. The right hon. Gentleman on the present occasion, discussing a remote and difficult chapter of law, had shown not less than his usual skill. But none the less, the right hon. Gentleman in his attempt to strip the matter of technicalities had not gone far enough, and he had not borne in his mind what was the real analogy of the two cases the Committee had to deal with. Stripped again of technicalities, what the right hon. Gentleman had asked the Committee to do was, having given England an inch, to allow Scotland to take an ell. The clause of the Bill, which let settlements which paid one duty off the payment of further Estate Duty of 1 per cent., had been framed with regard to the English law, and the very foundation and essence of it was that by taking off the payment of further Estate Duty they let off settlements not for all time, but only until there came in a person who was competent to dispose. In deferring the payment of duty until the estate passed into the hands of a person competent to deal with it, the property was not exempted from payment, for that was only during limited possession. In England property could only be tied up for existing and a term of 21 years afterwards, but in Scotland there was nothing of the kind. The law there was quite different.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY said, that upon this point the Scotch law was identically the same as the English law, the former having been altered by the Act of 1848.

MR. HALDANE pointed out that the alteration effected by that Act did not come into operation unless someone in the line of succession disentailed had the estate.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY said, that in Scotland anyone in the line of succession could put an end to the entail of his own sweet will. Of course, unless that were done the estate went on to its destination.

MR. HALDANE said, that would only be so in case the person attained 21. The Amendment, as he understood it, would cover all cases of property entailed, whether in modern times or already in existence.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had not read the Amendment. Particular reference was made to persons competent to dispose of the estate entail. The moment a previously unborn life succeeded he would be able to disentail without consents, and would, therefore, be a person competent to dispose of the property.

MR. HALDANE said, the question which the hon. Member was suggesting upon the Amendment was now raised for the first time. There was no analogy between such a case as he had put and the case of an English settlement with its limited power of disposition. It really meant "competent to dispose of" with the assent of other persons. The person would exercise dominion over the property vested in him. That would come under Clause 18, Sub-section 2(a). It had been decided that an English tenant entail, not in possession, and who could not disentail or bar the remainder without consent, could not be treated as competent to dispose. Working out the analogy, stripped of technicalities, the matter appeared plain enough.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he hoped that either then or upon the Report the Government would introduce words into the clause which would put the owners of land in settlement in both England and Scotland upon an equal footing in respect of this duty.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that the little that he knew of Scotch law was derived from the Waverley Novels and sources of that description, and therefore he could offer no opinion upon this very technical point. He must, however, point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite that the Government was in the fortunate position of having as their legal supporters two English and two Scotch gentlemen, all of whom happened to represent Scotch constituencies, who were unanimous in opposing the Amendment. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite must therefore admit that, notwithstanding his great authority, the majority of the Court were against him. He would, however, say that the matter should be further considered by the light of the arguments which had been put forward by hon. Members opposite, and that if the Legal Advisers of the Government were satisfied that a difficulty had been shown to exist the Government would do their best to remove it.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY was glad that the right hon. Gentleman was so far with him, but he must point out that so far from the majority of the Court being against him, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had sat silent, looking very unhappy at the injustice that was being done to his adopted country. The point really was not a technical one, and it was only to avoid incongruous results that he had moved the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY moved to omit Sub-section (a), and another Amendment on Clause 19. They were all parts of the same matter, which he was willing should be considered before Report.

Amendment proposed, in page 14, line 11, to leave out Sub-section (a).—(Mr. Graham Murray.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-Section (a) stand part of the Clause."

*THE LORD ADVOCATE declined to assent to the Amendment. If a person other than the owner of the estate paid the duty, he thereby paid the owner's debt and he should be in the position of being his assignee to all the rights which the Crown would have had against the owner. Difficulties would arise unless an effective and trenchant remedy was given.

MR. GRAHAM MURRAY said, he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 20.

MR. HANBURY moved an Amendment providing that the Act should come into operation not, as the clause proposed, on the last day of May, but on the first day of August.

Amendment proposed, in page 14, line 34, to leave out the words "the last day of May," and insert the words "the first day of August."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR W. HARCOURT accepted the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

*MR. H. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.) said, he moved to omit the clause from the Bill entirely. The effect would be the total abolition of the Tea Duties. It was perhaps strange that such a Motion should come from that side of the House, as the proposal was contained in the much talked of Newcastle Programme, and he was much surprised to find that, notwithstanding this, the right hon. Gentleman had again included the Tea Duties in his Budget. One of the great objections to the duty was its cost. It was impossible to say at what cost the innumerable Customs officers who kept watch and ward over the tea in the bonded warehouses were maintained, and the bonded warehouses themselves were a great source of expense. But it was disgraceful that tea, which was so sensitive and so quick at absorbing other flavours, should be by the Custom orders turned out at the warehouses from the original chests. So sensitive was tea that, although sent over in soldered packets, it could not be allowed to travel in the same ship with at all a strong-smelling cargo. Yet, on coming home here, 10 per cent. of it at least was turned out of the chests, and in order to be re-packed again had actually to be trodden in by the feet of the labourers employed in the warehouses. For this reason alone it would be impossible to find an article with more claims to free entry than tea. Then, again, no less than 85 per cent. of the tea now used in England came from the British Empire, and how could it be right to tax the produce of our own flesh and blood in our colonies while we let in free French silks and foreign satins. Quite lately, too, the Government had prevented the Government of India from taxing English cotton goods, and how could the same Government with any consistency now propose to tax India tea? Of course, it was easily explained. The right hon. Gentleman wanted the Lancashire vote, and Lancashire was tired of so-called Free Trade and wanted the indirect Protection afforded by damaging the Indian cotton mills. But the strongest argument against the Tea Duty rested on broader grounds. Why was tea to be taxed, or tobacco? Who was the richer by tea being made dear? Every penny of the tax was paid by the consumer, while a tax on foreign manufactured articles competing with our own would be largely paid by foreigners themselves. In the East End of London the want and poverty was deplorable on account of scarcity of employment. Women had actually to make there 144 match boxes for 2½d. because of foreign competition. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer wanted money let him tax foreign manufactured articles, such as prison-made goods from Germany, bounty-fed sugar, and Swedish match boxes, then he could give our people cheap tea and more work and wages at the same time. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might call it Protection, and so it was; but who would be afraid of advocating Protection when it meant protection for the labouring classes of our country from unjust and ruinous foreign competition?

Moved, "To leave out the Clause."—(Mr. H. Farquharson.)

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Lord Advocate

SIR W. HARCOURT : One would suppose, to listen to the speeches which have been made during the progress of this Bill in Committee, that the House had not voted a largely increased expenditure on the Navy. No less a sum than £4,000,000 is involved in this Amendment. The Committee has spent I do not know how many days in an endeavour to get rid of one provision in connection with the Estate Duty; and now we have reached the Tea Duty. The next Amendment has reference to the duty on beer, and after that the Committee are to be invited to take off the duty on spirits; to be followed by an attempt to decrease the Income Tax. This is the position of the House of Commons with reference to the provisions for the increased Expenditure of the year. The hon. Member said he did not know how anyone was made richer by tea being made dear. That is a position I accept, but it applies not only to tea, but to all articles. I do not think anyone is better for paying more for an article than he would be for paying less. I do not defend the Tea Duty or any other duty or tax whatever. I should be extremely delighted to dispense with all taxes; but, at the same time, if the country thinks it is necessary to spend money, the House of Commons will surely support some honest means of finding it. Hon. Gentlemen opposite say, "Spend the money, and let the Government find the money; only we won't pay it." [Cries of "No, no!"] Who is going to pay under the proposal of the hon. Member that there shall be taxes on all manufactured articles? I presume the people who use those articles will have to pay for them. I am always glad to hear a candid confession of faith: it is not too common in these days. The hon. Gentleman has candidly and frankly advocated Protection. I am not a Protectionist, neither are the other Members of the Government, and therefore the remedies proposed by the hon. Member for a repeal of the Tea Duty by putting on a universal tax for manufactured articles coming from abroad is one that the Government cannot accept.

MR. H. FARQUHARSON : I said nothing like that which the right hon. Gentleman attributes to me. I am not in the least in favour of putting a tax on all articles. Indeed, the object of my Motion is to prevent the taxation of tea, an article coming from abroad.

SIR W. HARCOURT : The hon. Gentleman felt obliged to propose a substitute when he took off the duty on tea, and he certainly said; unless I misheard him, "Why not put a tax on foreign manufactured articles." That is not the view Her Majesty's Government take of the financial policy of this country, but I should be taking up the time of the Committee unduly if I attempted to argue that question. The Government have adopted the policy of Free Trade and stand by it; therefore, they cannot accept this Motion.

MR. GOSCHEN : The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has spoken as if he were the first Chancellor of the Exchequer who had been assailed with proposals for reducing taxation during the discussions of the Budget. Nearly every year when I was at the Exchequer a Motion was made for the reduction of the Tea Duty by the hon. Member for Leicester, whether there was a surplus or not. It was a display made by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and many hours were spent by those hon. Gentlemen in endeavouring to make such holes in my Budget as my hon. Friend wishes now to make in the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Time after time the same course has been taken, but I will treat the right hon. Gentleman better than he treated me. I never remember that the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian discouraged those attacks; but I intend to return good for evil. I do not think it is possible to support the proposal of my hon. Friend, and I hope that it will not be debated at length. I think the Committee is anxious to get to the question of the Beer Duty. I remember the Irish Members moving Amendments night after night in the hope of making a hole in my Budget.

SIR W. HARCOURT : I did not do so.

MR. GOSCHEN : No; but the right hon. Gentleman failed to persuade his Irish friends below the Gangway to abstain from moving Amendments. He had not the influence over them that he possesses now. I should not have said so much had not the Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking as a Chancellor of the Exchequer, seemed to speak as if it was an unusual course to make such a Motion as the present. The course taken by my hon. Friend is by no means unusual, but I hope that the hon. Member will not think it necessary to divide against the clause.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) : I also would suggest to the hon. Member that he should not take the sense of the Committee on his Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman opposite spoke of this as a Protectionist Amendment, and said that not being a Protectionist he could not accept it. Well, I do not see any way to support it, though I am a Protectionist. If the hon. Member who moved the Amendment were prepared to ask the House of Commons to substitute certain taxes on foreign products, manufactured and otherwise, which I should be glad to support him in proposing, then I think the Tea Duty might very fairly be relegated to oblivion ; but so long as no effectual substitute is forthcoming, I, for one, do not wish to part with any indirect tax. We are far too much relying upon direct taxation instead of indirect taxation, which I, for one, decidedly give preference to. I only wish hon. Gentlemen not to run away with the idea that if we do not adopt this Amendment, or enter seriously into the discussion of it, it is not because many of us do not know that the fiscal system of this country is based on an entirely wrong principle. I could mention many taxes that would be far more equitable and less onerous than the Tea Duty. I will not go into them now ; but when a proper opportunity comes, I shall be prepared to contend that our entire fiscal system is rotten to the core and requires to be entirely remodelled and readjusted, and that taxes should be levied upon foreign products imported into this country, thereby obtaining in a fair manner contributions from the foreigner, instead of in the surreptitious manner the right hon. Gentleman is endeavouring to establish by means of Death Duties. In that way prosperity would be restored to many trades which are now being driven out of the country.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he had voted on more than one occasion with hon. Gentlemen opposite on this question. The Amendment was one which used to be proposed on every Budget by the hon. Member for Leicester. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had voted against the Budget of his own Party on more than one occasion—as against our fiscal system—and if a Division were taken that day he should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hampshire. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the Opposition were prepared to deprive him of £4,000,000, but that they did not propose taxes in substitution for those they would abolish. But the hon. Member who moved the Amendment had proposed taxes in substitution. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) was convinced that some future Chancellor of the Exchequer, though it might not be the right hon. Gentleman opposite, would have to contemplate the imposition of a fair duty on foreign articles, manufactured and otherwise, which competed with British industries.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 23.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said, he did not like the Committee to think he was opposing the present increase of Beer Duty as a representative of the brewers. On the contrary ; he had no interest in them, nor any relation with them. The brewers were strong enough to look after themselves, or if they had wanted an advocate they would have entrusted the subject to abler hands. He had not ventured to interfere in this Bill before, as he was no master of finance. He had left the knotty points of law to learned Gentlemen to argue, but it was because he believed the proposed increase in Beer Duties would injure his constituents as agriculturists that he ventured to move this Amendment. He believed, and would endeavour to prove, that the extra duty would fall not on the brewers, who might be able to bear it, though even if they could he thought that suddenly to propose what was equivalent to a 1s. 2d. Income Tax on an individual industry, or 1 per cent. on ordinary shares, was a strong measure. Nor would it fall on the consumer, but it would fall with all its weight on the unfortunate producer of the raw material—namely, barley. It would fall on an industry crippled in every way, already taxed beyond its strength—on a producer living in a country where taxes were yearly increasing, and having to compete on unfair terms with foreign growers of the same material. Of course, he knew this would be a Party Division. It was no use inquiring why. They all knew it. Two points they might agree on, and little as he knew of finance, he knew they were true. First, the Chancellor of the Exchequer must have money. They had an increased expenditure, to part of which the Opposition urged him. He (Colonel Lockwood) was proud of it. This expenditure must be at present met by extra taxation. In the second place, they believed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would endeavour to raise this in the fairest manner possible and in such a way that no industry would be injured by it. They believed that all should bear a fair share, and in short that the right hon. Gentleman tried, or ought to try, to get as near the equality of sacrifice as he could. That, of course, would be ideal taxation with an ideal Chancellor of the Exchequer. But some gentlemen opposite seemed to think that it was fair and sufficient to say, "If a man is rich and there must be extra taxes—tax him." But they knew that if this method were carried too far they would overreach them. Undue taxation upon one class would react upon others. Up to 1880 a Malt Tax, or really a Barley Tax, was paid on malt made and levied at the maltings. This tax, with the brewer's licence, amounted to 22s. per quarter, being thus levied on material. A quarter of barley paid a set duty of what its yield would be to the brewer. One quarter of English barley yielded 84 lbs. of extract and paid a duty of 22s., at the rate of about 8d. per lb.; whereas a quarter of foreign barley yielded 72 lbs. of extract, and paid a duty of 22s., at the rate of 8½d. This was equal to an extra duty of 3s. 6d. per quarter on the poorer producing or foreign barley, and acted as a sort of Protection Duty to the English or better producing barley. In June, 1867, came the Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Malt Tax. No doubt agriculturists thought repeal of the Malt Tax would be beneficial to them. In July, 1868, the Committee reported that they believed that repeal or reduction of the Malt Tax would lead to an increase in the consumption of malt and to an increase in the growth of barley for malting purposes, and thus benefit agriculture. In 1880 the Member for Midlothian repealed the Malt Tax and substituted a Beer

Duty, and he said in effect to farmers, "You get the repeal you wanted." To the Inland Revenue he said, "You will get 2s. per quarter by the change." To the cries of the brewers, who had to submit to an extra charge of 2s. per quarter, he replied, "Do not weep, you are going to benefit by Free Trade." He said, "I'm your best friend; I give you a free mash tub. You can use cheap foreign grain, or rice, or maize." He (Colonel Lockwood) confessed he regretted that the Chairman's casting vote carried the Report of the Select Committee. It had been satisfactorily proved that the agricultural party were wrong in their estimate and forecast of the effect of the repeal of the Malt Tax. They had hoped that the importation of malt would increase, and they contended that English barley would always fetch more for malting purposes than foreign. As a matter of fact, however, barley has decreased in price ever since. The prices realised had been as follows:—In 1880, 33s. 1d. per quarter; 1885, 30s. 1d.; 1890, 28s. 8d.; 1891, 28s. 2d.; 1892, 26s. 2d.; 1893, 25s. 7d. Thus, ever since 1880, barley, instead of holding its own, and instead of being used in greater quantities, had rapidly decreased in price. Again, he found that in 1880 3,150,000 quarters of foreign barley were imported, and in 1890 6,149,000 quarters. Not only were the agricultural party wrong, but the late Prime Minister was also wrong in his forecast of the future. The right hon. Gentleman held exactly the same opinion—namely, that the English farmer had nothing to fear from the importation of foreign barley. He added—

"We have been receiving corn from abroad for the last 40 years, and in that time British agriculture has thriven under Free Trade more than ever before."

The present proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would raise the duty to 27s. per quarter, and as that would exceed the value of barley, what was the outlook of those who grew it? Brewers said that they would not pay extra tax if they could help it, but would get it out of consumers by giving a weaker article. It might, perhaps, be said that that would be a good thing, but certainly it would not be an advantage to the farmers in his constituency, because, unluckily, the beer would be made with less barley and more foreign stuff. The brewer would use

4 per cent. less barley. At the end of the year he would have left, consequently, on his hands a proportionately larger stock. Next year he would purchase 4 per cent. less, and thus there would be a fall in consumption of 8 per cent. He believed the brewer would sooner use barley than foreign products if they could do so at a fair profit. Farmers were good customers to them, and large sums were sunk in malting, but this extra tax would force them into the cheapest market, and they would get it out of the producer by using raw grain and $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. less barley. He had seen beer made in that way, and had even tasted it. It was difficult to detect the difference between that liquor and beer brewed from English barley, but it was not what an Englishman asked for, and he could not think that it was an honest way of doing business. The consumer expected to get beer made from the materials of which it professed to be made, and he did not wish to have it brewed from all sorts of trash. As showing the line of action likely to be taken by the brewers, he would read a letter he had received from a small country brewer. It ran—

"I am pleased to see that you are going to move the rejection of the Beer Duty. When the head of my firm returned from the brewers' meeting, he said, 'Now, brewer, put on your thinking cap: my capital won't stand this extra 6d. It has to be found somewhere, and you must find it.' The result is we now run the same length from a 20-quarter mash, made up previously as follows: 15 quarters English malt, 3 quarters slake malt, English make, 2 quarters English glucose. The present: 10 quarters (20 cwt.) American glucose, 4 quarters English malt, 3 quarters Californian, 3 quarters U.S. slake malt. Who gains? The Revenue—proprietors hold their own. Who loses? The English farmer! His malting barley is not as good now as grinding previous to '80. The public ales brewed on the old style were liquid foods—muscle-making, strength-giving. The present, though well liked, are alcoholic; the little unfermented sugar makes heat, not energy; it is not a food. Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer aware that he is driving the staple industry from the country? Brewers must get their supplies in the cheapest market."

The letter concluded with remarks which were not of a very complimentary nature, and he did not think they were suited to the occasion, so he would not read them. But let them consider what the loss in the sale of barley meant to the farmer. The duty paid by brewers on barley up to April, 1894, represented £9,500,000. This, at three barrels to £1, represented

Colonel Lockwood

28,500,000 barrels. Taking four barrels to the quarter, a reduced consumption of 4 per cent. represented 284,000 quarters; and if the reduction were $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. it would mean 532,000 less quarters. A fall of 4 per cent., therefore, involved a loss of £355,000, and of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. a loss of £665,000 on one industry. Could they view such a loss to the British farmer with equanimity? The Chancellor of the Exchequer might say that barley was not used for malting alone. That was so; but the difference in the price of malting barley and grinding barley worked out at 7s. per quarter, which meant his rent per annum. He had endeavoured to put the case of his constituents fairly, although perhaps he had done so inadequately, before the House, and he was sure hon. Members would not wonder that the farmers viewed with alarm any increase of taxation on their products and on an industry already so seriously crippled. Surely a House famed throughout the world for its generous instincts would endeavour to assist the weak and would hesitate before imposing this additional tax on this industry.

Amendment proposed, in page 15, line 36, to leave out the word "sixpence," and insert the word "threepence."—
(Colonel Lockwood.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'sixpence' stand part of the Clause."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I have heard with satisfaction the pleasant and able speech of the hon. and gallant Member; but he must forgive me for declining to regard him as the real mover in this matter. He has come forward to represent an industry, but the real mover is the hon. Member for Wimbledon, who sits behind him, and who, on the first occasion, appeared on the scene as the opponent of any tax on beer. I think, consistently with the course taken through these Debates, it is always the person affected who is interested in somebody else. The millionaire does not care for himself. It is the poor widow and her small annuity that he cares for. That is always the case. The great landed proprietor with his palace and pleasure grounds does not care for himself. It is only the poor labourer that he cares for. And so with the brewer and distiller. They do not care for themselves. They are far too disinterested for that. Their feeling is entirely for the farmer and the agriculturist. It is extraordinary the disinterested point of view from which every interest regards the tax that affects them. It is a remarkable fact also that the landed interest is determined, whatever else happens, it shall not be taxed. The whole opposition has come from the landed interest. The main part of the Estate Duty—about five-sixths—will be paid by personalty, but personalty has not appeared to refuse to bear its share. We come to the next tax—the tax upon beer and spirits—and the landed interest again complain that they will be indirectly affected by that tax. It is clear, therefore, that whatever tax is imposed the claim is always put forward by the landed interest that their contribution ought to be different from that of other people. The hon. Member's object—and it is a legitimate object if he can accomplish it—is that beer shall be brewed exclusively from malt and hops. Will he get the hon. Member for Wimbledon to support that view? I would like to know what the brewers are going to say to that proposal. Are they going to accept the doctrine that beer is to be brewed only from malt and hops? because the fact is, as I shall be able to show, that enormous profits have been made, quite apart from this terrible Budget, from beer brewed from very different things than malt and hops. But there will be an opportunity under a future clause, on an Amendment by the hon. Member for the Sudbury Division of Suffolk, of inviting brewers to vote in favour of a proposition that the tax shall be remitted in the case of all beer brewed exclusively from malt and hops. The brewers will lose a great deal more than they will gain under this proposal. We have the information given upon the subject by the hon. Member for Wimbledon. He says very candidly that this tax would not fall upon the brewer. Why, then, do the brewers object? Why are these meetings of brewers and publicans gathered together up and down the country to agitate against this tax? Is it in order that they might preach the gospel of pure beer, brewed exclusively from malt and hops? We have a little light on this point, because it is not for the first time that beer has been brewed from materials other than malt and hops. Why were not all these meetings called before to protect the unfortunate agricultural interest from the evil practice of oppressed brewers? The hon. Member for Wimbledon says that in the year 1876, while 58,000,000 bushels of malt were used in brewing, 820,000 cwt. of sugar were used; in 1880, while there were 55,850,000 bushels of malt used, 1,146,434 cwt. of sugar were used; in 1887, the number of bushels of malt used sank to 52,319,000, whereas the number of cwt. of sugar used rose to 1,465,000; and in 1893, the malt used was 55,655,000 bushels, and the sugar 2,122,000 cwt. During all this time the brewers have been using less and less malt and more and more sugar, and why? Because it pays them better—a most sensible reason. I do not object to that for a moment; but if the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has moved the Amendment thinks that the brewers are going to use malt when using sugar pays them better, he is more innocent than I took him to be. [Colonel Lockwood: I am.] He says the brewers are longing to use barley if they can only get it at a fair price. They have got barley at half the price which they paid before, but nevertheless they use less and less barley, and more and more sugar. The hon. Member for Wimbledon says that his own barley buyer in Norfolk has bought the best barley in the same market for a number of years, and from the figures he finds that in 1876 the average price of the best malting barley was 45s. 6d.; in 1880 it was 42s. 10d.; in 1887, 34s.; and in 1893 it went as low as 28s. Then the hon. Member for Wimbledon, who can get now the same barley for 28s. as he had to pay 45s. 6d. for in 1876, uses twice as much sugar as he did when barley was so cheap. Yet the hon. Member for Sudbury thinks that the brewers are anxious to use the best barley, and that if only they are spared the 3d. they will use nothing else. Before this Budget was introduced the hon. Member said that at the Institute of Brewing it was decided that 10 per cent. of raw grain could be used in brewing without spoiling the article, and the hon. and gallant Member testifies to that himself, for he tasted and found that the beer was just as good. Does the hon. Member really believe that the brewer who can brew just as good beer at a greatly less price is going to brew it from much more expensive materials simply in order to encourage the barley growers? Sic notus Ulixes? He must have a very imperfect acquaintance with brewers. Therefore, the notion that the brewers are the real patrons of the growers of pure barley is one of those fictions which do not correspond to the facts with which we are acquainted. I do not wish to speak disrespectfully of the trade. They are very good customers of the Department over which I preside; but I am very glad to think that these customers are in a very flourishing condition, and that the grievance of a 6d. duty will not be disastrous. I do not understand why the hon. and gallant Member makes two bites at a cherry. If he is really in favour of English malt, why does he allow 3d. to be put on instead of 6d.? He did not explain that. It is a very curious part of his argument on which he throws no light. In imposing heavy taxes you must see that they are drawn with the least hardship to those who pay them. If you get money by taxation of this kind, is there any commodity upon which you can more fairly raise it than beer and spirits? If you were to succeed in the course you are taking, the consequence is certain that hereafter you would have in this country nothing but direct taxation. If you refuse to tax beer and spirits, there is no other means of making provision for the great and growing expenditure of this country than direct taxation. If you refuse to-night to raise the money required by means of this tax on beer and spirits, to-morrow you must put it on the Income Tax. I am sufficiently old-fashioned in my financial notions, acquired in the school in which I have been bred, to make a proposal for increasing direct taxation accompanied by the taxation upon beer and spirits. Can the interests affected afford to bear this taxation? On a former occasion I gave some Returns. I will give some of the figures again. In 1884-5 the number of assessments to the Income Tax from brewers was 2,446, and the whole of their profits assessed amounted to £6,316,000. Ten years later the number of brewers assessed for Income Tax was 2,274, showing that the smaller brewers were being more and more absorbed by the great concerns, while the amount of assessed profits was £10,177,000, showing an increase of 60 per cent. in the profits of the brewing trade during those 10 years. But the general profits of trade under Schedule (B) increased, during the same period, only 13 per cent. In looking to see what trade is able to bear a moderate increase of taxation, is it right, or is it not right, to lay the increase upon that trade which shows an increase in profits amounting to 60 per cent., as compared with the general trade which shows an increase of 13 per cent.?

*MR. BONSOR: Does the right hon. Gentleman say that there are 2,274 brewers?

SIR W. HARCOURT: That is the number of assessments. That, I say, is a question worthy of our consideration. I have given these figures, but I will give some others. In 1882 the number of barrels of beer was 27,298,000, while in 1889 it was 28,064,000. That was the year before the alteration made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, which was equivalent to a duty of 3d. Has the trade fallen off since then? Last year, which was a period of extreme depression in trade, the number of barrels was 30,500,000, equal to an increase of nearly 10 per cent. over the consumption of 1889. Why is it that this trade has made such a great advance? The year 1893 was, as I noted in my Budget speech, one of the most disastrous years we have experienced, owing to strikes and various disturbing causes; yet in that year there was the largest amount ever known of beer consumed in this country, producing an increased duty of £80,000. What, Sir, is the reason for this enormous growth of the trade? I also gave some figures before as to the fall in price of materials used in the brewing trade, to which I will refer again. That fall is of a most remarkable character, and, if thought necessary, I will give the figures again. Without going into details just now, I may state that there has been during the period referred to—during the last 20 years—a fall of something like 30 per cent. to 40 per cent. upon all the articles used in brewing. The amount of duty is a small thing as compared with the cost of materials, and the great fall in the price of materials has not, moreover, been met by a corresponding decrease in the price to the consumer. It must, therefore, have gone into the pockets of the brewers. They have used cheaper materials; their old materials have become less expensive; they have used the substitutes referred to by the hon. Member in largely increased quantities; while all the old materials have fallen in price; they have been able to employ new materials which are cheaper still; and the result of all this has been that these great profits have been made. Well, Sir, I know the pressure that has been put upon people in this trade. We have heard a good deal about boycotting; but of all the boycotting nothing has been so severe as that which has been practised in this trade. If a Parliamentary Inquiry were instituted into that, it would reveal some remarkable circumstances. All persons have not, however, taken the view that this is a ruinous and oppressive tax. A letter was sent to me, which was published in April last, signed by Mr. M. W. Hodgson, of Messrs. William Butler and Co. (Limited), Wolverhampton, in which he stated that the effect of the new tax to the consumer would be but trifling; that it was not sufficient to affect the retail price; and stating that, in the main, he was favourable to the Budget proposals; and Mr. Hodgson added that he thought that the burden of added taxation which was rendered necessary to meet a large deficit had been fairly and justly distributed; and that, in face of the overwhelming evidence of the increasing popularity of beer as a national beverage, it was hardly possible to maintain that the industry of brewing was taxed beyond its power. What a pity it is that there are not more brewers with courage enough to hold language of that kind!—the hon. Member for Liverpool, for example.

Mr. W. LONG was understood to ask why he was referred to by the right hon. Gentleman? He was not sure whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to convey that he (Mr. Long) represented the wealthy brewers.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I understood that the hon. Member had some connection with the brewing industry.

Mr. W. LONG objected to being classed among brewers making large profits, to whom the right hon. Gentleman had been alluding.

SIR W. HARCOURT: If the hon. Member does not belong to that class it is, I suppose, because he considers it necessary, in the position which he holds, to use nothing but pure malt and hops, and under those circumstances he may not find it a paying concern. But perhaps in future he will follow the example of the hon. Member for Wimbledon.

*MR. BONSOR: I hope he will. I should be glad, however, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer will tell me what it is he says I do use.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I supposed, from the hon. Member telling us on a former occasion all about the substitutes employed in brewing, that he employed them himself.

*MR. BONSOR asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was going to tell him what it was that his firm used in the manufacture of beer besides malt and hops?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Is the hon. Member prepared to tell the Committee that neither he nor any other brewers have used anything in the manufacture of beer except malt and hops? If he makes such a statement I confess that it will astonish me greatly.

*MR. BONSOR: I can tell the right hon. Gentleman to-morrow exactly what my firm used during the past year, but, as far I know, we used 125,000 quarters of malt, and a quantity of sugar, equivalent to 3,000 quarters.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then in that case what is the meaning of the figures that the hon. Member gave us to show the immense increase in the quantity of sugar used in brewing? I can assure the hon. Member that I was not guilty of the impertinence of asking him to state what ingredients he uses in his particular business. I was merely speaking of the immense quantity of materials other than malt and hops that are used in the manufacture of beer by the trade generally. I may, however, point out that the Budget does not appear to have injuriously affected the brewing interest, because I observe that since the Budget has been introduced the price of shares in the great Brewing Companies has gone up. I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman whether he really believes that the price of barley has gone down in consequence of the Budget proposals?

MR. BONSOR: All I can say is, that barley was quoted a fortnight ago cheaper than it has ever been before.

SIR W. HARCOURT: And so was wheat. I may tell the hon. Member that of late all grains have become cheaper, and that of all of them barley has fallen the least in price. We know why the price of grains generally has fallen; it is because of the importation of foreign grain. A great quantity of Russian barley has been coming into the country, and that is the reason why the price of the commodity has fallen, and not because of the Budget proposals. It is, indeed, the fact that the price of barley would have fallen even lower had it not been for the fact of great consumption of it in the manufacture of beer. Therefore, the assertion that the price of barley has fallen in consequence of the proposal to place an additional duty of 6d. a barrel upon beer is without foundation. I think that, upon the whole, the Committee will come to the conclusion that there is no inability on the part of the brewing trade to bear this moderate increased taxation of 6d. upon 36 gallons, which amounts to 144 quarts of beer. That was a point that was strongly dwelt upon by the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, whom I am sorry not to see in his place just now, when he imposed an additional duty upon beer, and I do not think that it can be contended that the additional duty which I am asking the Committee to assent to is an oppressive one. I desire to ask hon. Members opposite what course they propose to take in reference to this question? and I especially put that question to those right hon. Gentlemen who have been responsible in the past, and who may be responsible again in the future, for the finances of this country. Are they going to-night to take a course that will cut them off in the future from the right to increase the duty upon beer, even if the finances of the country require that they should do so? This is a point upon which I think we are entitled to an answer from hon. Members opposite before we go to a Division. If you are going to impose this increased duty upon beer, you will do so not because you object to an increased duty upon beer, but because you think that if you can get a majority you will be able to displace the Government. That is your object, under whatever guise or disguise you may seek to conceal it. That is your object; but look at the consequences of such a course of action to yourselves! By taking such a course you will be debarring yourselves in the future from increasing the duty upon excisable articles whenever the necessities of the defence of the country require that you should do so. That is the position in which, for factious purposes, the Conservative Party is going to place itself in the eyes of the country. Whether that will redound to its credit or not I do not know, but I have, at all events, ventured to tell hon. Members opposite what the consequences of their proposed action will be. If they now refuse to place additional taxation upon beer and spirits, they will lay down the principle that in future the whole additional Revenue of this country is to be raised by direct taxation, and I ask them whether it is worth while, in order to obtain a momentary and a temporary advantage, to establish such a principle of finance for the future. We, on the contrary, have proposed what we believe to be a fair system under which the pressure of taxation will be equally distributed. The money that the Government propose to raise must be obtained somehow, and where are you going to find it? By striking off 2d. from the beer and 3d. from the spirits, you will render the National Exchequer insolvent by some £600,000 or £700,000. You have already voted an additional expenditure of £4,000,000 upon the Navy, and are you now going to make this country appear before the world as an insolvent nation which is not prepared to meet its liabilities? I ask again whether you, who have been responsible for the government of this country, and who may very soon be responsible for it again, are willing to go before your countrymen with this shabby insolvency in the interests of the brewers and the publicans, and with the farcical pretence of the effect of our proposals upon the price of barley and malt, and say to them, "When it was our duty to provide for the expenditure of the country, we struck off 2d. from the beer and 3d. from the spirits, and left a deficit in the national finances in the face of a demand for an increase in the defences of the country"?

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said, he was sure that all who had heard the speech of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Essex (Colonel Lockwood), who introduced this Motion, would have recognised in it a moderation and a fairness which were in most striking contrast with the speech in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer attempted to answer it. He ventured to say, that of all the extraordinary anomalies and paradoxes—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

SIR E. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT said, he was saying that of all the extraordinary paradoxes and anomalies which could be presented to this House and the country, the fact that the Government who were responsible for the Local Option Bill should try to make up their deficiency out of the drink of the people, stood foremost. He saw opposite to him one at least of the prominent representatives of the teetotal movement (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), and he ventured to remind that hon. Gentleman and others who held his views of the enormous interests which were at stake in the trade which they were so fond of attacking, and against which the present duty was principally aimed. This trade paid £33,000,000 towards the taxation of this country, which was nearly one-third of the enormous Budget of the Government, and nearly enough to meet the expenses of the Army and Navy together. That sum was derived by the Excise from taxation on beer, spirits, and wine. The malt and corn used in brewing amounted to no less than 70,000,000 of bushels; there were no less than 2,250,000 acres of barley under cultivation, and 600,000 acres of hops, and the trade gave the means of maintenance to no less than 2,000,000 of people. Could anything, in view of these facts, be more absurd than the attacks made upon the brewing and licensed trades? No doubt the Representatives of the temperance interests would try and justify the extra duty on the ground that the consumption of these liquors was injurious to mankind. He disputed that altogether. Of all the intemperate people in the world, give him the advocates of temperance. The most intemperate and most foolish people in the world were the teetotal party of this country. To suppose for a moment that these excellent products would have been provided by Providence and not meant for human consumption was so absurd as to require no refutation. The true theory of temperance was moderation in the use of wine and beer. Moderation was most desirable; but to say that they should be entirely eschewed and destroyed was an utter absurdity. Well, the Budget proposed to place considerable extra taxation on beer and spirits—an increase amounting to 8 per cent. in the case of beer; but he maintained that the trade was already as heavily taxed as it ought to be. The Government declined to increase the taxation on wine, which was entirely a foreign product, whilst they proposed to increase that on beer and spirits, which were almost entirely English productions. At the last Election the Radical Party issued leaflets, showing that the poor man's articles of consumption—amongst which was beer—were taxed much more heavily than the rich man's wine. That was one of their stock cries to the electors, especially in the agricultural districts. They heard no more of that now. The poor man's beer was now to bear the brunt of the extra taxation, and the rich man's wine was to go free, and why? Because the results of the taxation upon wine proved to the Exchequer that it was impossible that wine could be more heavily taxed, and yet wine only paid 8 per cent., while beer under the new duty would pay at least 15 per cent. He commended that to Radical wirepullers and electioneering agents. Those who appealed to the country at the last Election on the ground that the poor man's articles were excessively taxed were now going to increase the tax on beer. It was singular and remarkable that new taxation upon articles of drink consumed by the poor compared with the articles of drink consumed by the rich, was as 15 to 8 per cent. He had taken some extracts from The Financial Reform Almanack, and that publication dealt with this matter practically; and he found that eminent Radical authority stated out of every 1s. expended, the consumers paid in taxation upon cocoa 1½d., upon coffee 2½d., currants 3½d., raisins 2½d., tea 3d., spirits 8½d., and tobacco 9½d.; and making a calculation, which the almanack omitted, he estimated that every consumer of beer paid from 4d. to 5d. out of every 1s. in taxation. He thought these facts showed that the Radical Party were now not taxing the rich brewer or rich man, but were practically imposing the extra taxation on the poor man. The hon. and gallant Member for Essex (Colonel Lockwood) had said that the tax would not fall largely on the consumer, unless there was adulteration, or on the brewer, but mainly on the agricultural interest. He did not altogether agree with his hon. Friend. He believed it would fall considerably on the consumer, because although he did not believe the price of beer would be raised, yet it was highly probable that the consumer would get an inferior article. [Sir W. LAWSON: Hear, hear!] He did not quite see the point of that cheer. If the producer was driven to the use of inferior articles by unjust extra taxation he did not think it was a matter for exultation on the part of the so-called advocates of temperance, who were encouraging this extra tax. That could be the only raison d'être of the cheer of the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson). His hon. and gallant Friend showed that the Malt Tax up to 1880 amounted to 22s. a quarter on barley, but under the proposed increased duty the tax per quarter upon barley would amount to between 27s. and 28s. per quarter. The price of barley now was between 25s. and 26s. per quarter, and it was therefore perfectly clear that the duty under this Budget upon barley would amount to a tax of over 100 per cent. on its cost price. However much the Chancellor of the Exchequer might see fit to rally the brewers, justly or unjustly, on the use of foreign produce, it was perfectly certain that, if they thus increased the taxation on English barley, they would drive it out of use, and encourage the use of such foreign products as rice, sugar, maize, and other articles in the manufacture of beer, the use of which would not benefit the English agriculturist. He well remembered when the late Prime Minister the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) introduced his Bill for the repeal of the Malt Tax and substituting a direct tax upon beer that the right hon. Gentleman dealt, that he gloated — [Laughter] — he gloated with rhetorical satisfaction — [Laughter.] The hon. Gentlemen who treated that with ridicule were not in the House at the time and did not remember the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, but he did, and he remembered how the right hon. Gentleman dwelt with the utmost satisfaction upon the fact that rice, maize, sugar, and other foreign articles would soon be used in making beer. If that result had come about it had certainly not been for the benefit of agriculture. That anti-English policy was being further developed in the present Budget. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had just given them one of his well-worn speeches, which were now like old jokes, exhausted chestnuts. The right hon. Gentleman denounced the landed interest and said, "You tell us on every occasion that taxation is to fall too heavily on land and that is all you can say." They had heard that speech from the Chancellor of the Exchequer over and over again, ad nauseam. The right hon. Gentleman ventured upon a personal attack on the hon. Member for Wimbledon (Mr. Bonsor) and the Member for Liverpool (Mr. W. Long), and in regard to both those hon. Gentlemen he was practically obliged to withdraw his observations. The Member for Wimbledon got up and informed him that in his brewery, at all events, the proportion of English products was enormous — namely, some 125,000 quarters of barley to some 3,000 cwt. of sugar. [Mr. BONSOR: No, malt.] At all events, there was no doubt that a great proportion of that malt was of English growth. His hon. Friend, no doubt, wished to be strictly accurate, and therefore corrected him as to the exact words used. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had treated them to one of his well-known tirades against the landed interest, but the sort of reply which he had made to the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Essex was mere bunkum. Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer had talked about the "monopoly of the liquor traffic," but he should like to ask him what that meant? Such a declaration had no intelligent meaning at all. There was no such thing as a "monopoly of the liquor traffic." Any man who could obtain a licence could go into the liquor trade, and that trade was not confined to any class of persons. The right hon. Gentleman's remark was one of those vain and wild phrases in which he frequently indulged. The right hon. Gentleman had also talked about "a shabby insolvency," if they refused this duty, but that was another remark which was devoid of meaning or intelligence. The Conservative Party were in power six years, but there was no talk of insolvency then. They reduced taxation all round whilst raising the Navy to a high point of efficiency. Lord Salisbury's Government lowered the Income Tax, the duties on tea, tobacco, and small houses. They practically reduced the National Debt by £100,000,000, besides making great contributions in relief of local taxation. There was no more intelligence in taunting the Conservatives with "shabby insolvency" than there was in his observation about the liquor monopoly. Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the price of the products used in the manufacture of beer had fallen 40 per cent. during the past 20 years, and he said that the brewers had gained that 40 per cent., but he doubted the accuracy of the 40 per cent. reduction; did he forget that the expenses of the brewing trade must have increased in that time? Wages were higher, buildings were more expensive, and the cost of horses, and so forth, had largely increased. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer ignored all this, and calmly told them that the diminished cost must have gone into the brewers' pockets. He ventured to disbelieve the right hon. Gentleman; he believed that the information given to the right hon. Gentleman must have been incorrect. Now, with regard to this extra duty, the Chancellor of the Exchequer concluded his argument with a statement that the brewing interest was best able to bear this impost, and he gave some figures which the hon. Member for Wimbledon pricked by a single remark. There were 10,000 brewers in this country, whereas, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, only some 2,275 were assessed to the Income Tax. What became of the other 7,500? Was it to be assumed that they paid no Income Tax whatever? The figures of the right hon. Gentleman were evidently of a very peculiar and select character, and no fair argument could be based upon them. But the right hon. Gentleman did give them some other figures with which they were able to deal. The right hon. Gentleman told them that the barrels of beer brewed in 1882 were 27,298,000 barrels, or that was the number on which the tax was paid, whereas, in 1893 there were 30,000,000 barrels, or an increase of about 2,300,000 barrels. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had altogether left out of calculation the fact that in these 12 years there had been an increase in the population which bore a greater ratio than the increase in the consumption of beer, so that he did not see the relevancy of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. There could not be the slightest doubt that this duty would fall very heavily upon the agricultural interests. Whether the brewers used more foreign articles such as rice, maize, and sugar, than they formerly used did not affect the argument. The brewers might be wrong in the articles they used, but at the same time the agricultural interests might be seriously damaged by the extra taxation imposed by the Government. If they put an extra duty of 2s. per quarter on English barley it would tend to drive English barley out of the field as compared with foreign barley and as compared with the cheaper products, such as rice, maize, sugar, and other articles. Therefore, just as the action of the Government in imposing an enormous Estate Duty upon land would undoubtedly injure the landed interest, the farmer, the labourer, and the thousands of servants employed about the great houses and properties of this country, so there was not a doubt that by this extra Beer Duty they were imposing a heavy extra burden upon the English agricultural interest, at a time when that interest was least able to bear it. The argument was often used that this duty would mainly fall upon the wealthy brewers. No doubt it might, to a certain extent, fall on brewers who were wealthy, but during the last six years a very great revolution had come over the ownership of the great brewing properties in this country. The great brewing interest was no longer in the hands of a few rich men, but was held by thousands and scores of thousands of small shareholders throughout the country. The interest paid upon the brewing capital was nothing like the enormous proportion it had been represented to be. He believed the most accurate figures would show that the return on the capital invested in breweries, as a whole, amounted to less than 7 per cent. An estimate derived from the dividends paid on the ordinary shares must be most fallacious. The ordinary shares formed a very small proportion of the capital in breweries. In estimating the average amount paid upon brewing capital they must take into consideration the debentures and preference shares. Taking all these interests into calculation, he believed it could be shown that the average return to brewing capital was very little over 6 per cent., if so much; and that was received not by big monopolists, but by thousands upon thousands of small investors throughout the country. Therefore, if this tax fell upon the shareholders in breweries, it fell upon the small investors. If it should not be paid by them, but by the consumer, owing to the adulteration of the beer, the tax would fall upon the poor. So that this new tax was essentially a tax, not upon the wealthier, but upon the middle or the working classes. He had a Return of 21 English railways which showed an average profit of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; 21 banks with a profit of 14 per cent.; 21 Insurance Companies, $22\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., and 21 miscellaneous Companies, $12\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. These latter included a Company called Brunner, Mond, and Company, which paid 50 per cent. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer told them it was fair to charge this extra tax upon the brewing interests, because they paid larger dividends than other interests, he stated that which could not be proved by an examination of the figures. This tax was not a just tax, but was a very heavy imposition upon the agricultural interests which could ill afford to pay it. It was a tax which came with a very ill grace from the Party who appealed to the electorate at the last Election on the ground that the poor man's beer was taxed more heavily than the rich man's wine. The poor man's beer would now pay 15 per cent., while the rich man's wine was only taxed 8 per cent. Because this duty was in itself inexpedient, because it would fall upon a valuable industry already very heavily taxed, if not over-taxed, because it was excessive in comparison with the taxation which other trades and industries already bore, and, above all, because it was a heavy burden upon the land and upon the agricultural interest which was suffering from great depression, and which required relief from, instead of additional, taxation, he should support the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend and oppose this extra duty upon beer.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said, he always learned something from the speeches of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and he had learned now that beer was one of the products of Providence, which he never knew before. He thought it was made by the hon. Member for Wimbledon. He was very glad the Chancellor of the Exchequer had got to what they might call the last big fence in these proceedings, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would clear it that night as well as he did upon the Second Reading. Of course, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was bound to get this taxation to meet an increased expenditure. They all knew the circumstances under which he had to make his proposals for increased taxation. The regular scare came round. They had a Navy scare every three or four years as regularly as the years came round, and there had been a great demand that they should have a strong Navy—twice as big as any other Navy—and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was bound to find money for that purpose. That being the object of all this increased taxation, he thought there were no two classes in the country who would be so keen at raising the money as the land and the liquor interests, because he considered them the two most patriotic classes in the whole country—as far as words went. They were always talking of the first defence of the country—the Navy. As to the liquor men, he never saw such a "Rule Britannia" lot in his life. They sometimes did him the honour of attending his meetings, and during the whole of the proceedings they did nothing but sing "Rule Britannia." Instead, however, of being anxious and willing to show their patriotism by supporting the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal for raising this requisite money, they found them opposing it more than anybody else. The reason they were told that one class of people were not to pay was because their trade, that of land owning, was in such a bad condition, and now they were told that the liquor men were not to pay because their trade was in such a good condition. They were told if they found a trade increasing and prospering, if they put on this tax they were going to kill it, but whether depressed or flourishing no trade was to pay. Notwithstanding the attempt to minimise the matter by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, the liquor trade was very flourishing. He remembered some years ago, when trade was very bad in the country, a well-known gentleman in the trade said, at a meeting at Burton, that "Burton was the one green spot in the world." The landlords'

Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett

fight was pretty well over in this Budget, and now they had a great combination against this liquor tax. Let them look at the party who formed this combination and see whether they had any reason in the course they had taken. Of course, first of all they had the hon. Gentlemen on the other side, all voting unanimously against this increase of 6d. He remembered reading in one of Marian Crawford's novels that "Beer is the great irrigator of Conservative principles," and he remembered the noble Lord the Member for Rochester giving what he had always thought was about the best summary of Tory policy that he had ever read. He believed it was the first speech the noble Lord ever made, and addressing working men, he said—

"If you working men will help us to keep our land we will help you to keep your beer."

Therefore, he thought they were taking a very consistent and straightforward course. Then they came to some more allies—small in number, vigorous and able men. He meant the nine gentlemen who came from Ireland. He was rather surprised at the course they were taking, because he understood they were Home Rulers. But he found on the 11th of April, 1893, a Manifesto of the Unionist Alliance was put forward, and that 14 drink sellers gave to that Unionist Alliance £12,900, equal to £940 each, therefore he thought it was a very curious alliance these nine gentlemen were making with these great wealthy liquor-sellers in Ireland. Of course, he knew they were saying that they must support an Irish industry. That sounded very well, but what sort of an industry was this they said they must support in Ireland? He would not give his own opinion of it, because he was tainted. He would tell them what Michael Davitt said about this industry these nine gentlemen were supporting—

"It is an industry which fills our lunatic asylums with its hopeless victims, our gaols with criminals, our streets with unfortunates, and tens of thousands of homes with squalor, want, and misery."

And for the sake of this industry these nine gentlemen were going to throw away the care and regard they used to tell them they had for Home Rule. They were straightforward, and he did not blame them. If two men had to ride on one horse, one must ride first, and in this case the nine gentlemen were very straightforward. They put whisky first, and Home Rule second. The third of the great allies were, of course, the trade. They had not heard them that night. They had only heard the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who took care to say he was not in the trade. He could not have spoken better for it if he had been. The trade was rather mysterious. They put out three theories, as far as he could understand, as to who paid this tax. First, they sometimes said the seller paid it; sometimes they said it was the buyer; and then they sometimes said that nobody paid it. He would take the three theories. Suppose the seller paid it. He thought that after the profits he had been shown to make the seller was the man who could very well afford to pay it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had given an account of the great profits this trade made, but he would also give another instance. He got the other day accounts of the wills of 14 brewers and wine merchants, who died last year, and the total property they left was £3,291,000, or an average of £235,000 each. He thought that was a pretty good sum, and showed that if anybody could afford to pay the increased tax, it was the trader. The consumer, it was sometimes said, would have to pay, and they were consumed with a burning desire to relieve the unhappy consumer of having this sum to pay. Had the consumer to pay it? They had had no public meetings of anybody but the traders crying out against this taxation. What did the late Chancellor of the Exchequer say, when he put forward an increased Beer Tax in 1889? He said—

"I beg the Committee to observe that I am obtaining my Revenue by the addition of a tax which cannot be felt by the consumer."

Even if the consumer did pay it was a very small sum indeed. Sixpence a barrel of 36 gallons was a penny on six gallons, which contained 96 half pints. If there was a man who drank a gallon, he only paid one-sixth of a penny, and he could escape altogether if he did not drink at all. If that was robbing the poor man of his beer it was only robbing him of one-sixth part of a penny per gallon, and he did not think, good honest drinker that he was, he could complain of that. One theory was that nobody paid the taxation. That was nonsense. They could not get bread from a stone, and they could not get taxation unless somebody paid it. The meaning of the matter was explained by The Times of that morning with its usual felicity. Talking about the Budget, it said—

"But, if it is probable that by trade manipulations the consumer will, in the long run, have to pay the increased duty, we think it is both just and reasonable that the masses of the people should in this manner contribute to the increased cost of maintaining a State of which they are practically the masters."

But what did "trade manipulations" mean? It meant nothing more nor less than putting more water into the beer. That was a very good thing, too. He said the more water they put into the beer the better for the beer. Water was a product of Providence—though the hon. Member opposite thought beer was—and he said the more providential stuff they put into the beer the better it would be, because the man who drank the beer would suffer less, and the man who sold the beer would put more money into his pocket. It would be a blessing both to the man who gave and the man who received. Now he came to the temperance man. He read in The Church of England Temperance Chronicle that every increase of the tax made temperance reform harder to carry. If that were so, he supposed every decrease of the tax would make temperance more easy to carry, and that if they took off every tax and had free trade in drink it would, according to these authorities, be the quickest way to reform. He had seen an able letter from his hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone, in which the hon. Member said that though anxious indeed to promote temperance, he was bound, on this occasion, to vote with his friends the brewers. Of course, it was very difficult to argue the financial point. He would set John Stuart Mill against his hon. Friend, and John Stuart Mill said that "every increase of duty is prohibition to the poor man."

If they made the increase so large that a certain class could not get it that must be prohibition to a certain extent, and he should have thought so long as they raised the larger portion of the Revenue, as the hon. Member pointed out, by promoting this drinking with all its misery; that if they tried to check this consumption by putting on some little additional price, it would be rather an additional obstacle than an advantage to the drinker. The brewers were not always wrong. He had known them right on the drink question before now. About 1830, when a Bill was introduced to make the sale of beer free, who went against it? The licensed victuallers, and quite right too. Free beer would be one of the greatest curses to this country. When the right hon. Member for Midlothian was led away into increasing the facilities for drink by introducing wine licences, who fought against it? The great trade fought against it. They joined with the prohibitionists and went on a great deputation to the Member for Midlothian, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and The Times the next day said the deputation was composed of knaves and fools. He thought the hon. Member for South Tyrone would find he was not doing very much for temperance in the line he was taking up. He did not wish to be hard upon the hon. Member; he was far too old a friend for that. All he said was he pitied him most sincerely when he saw him that night driving through the Lobby in a brewer's dray. The hon. Member in his letter said—

"The truth is, Sir W. Harcourt's proposals must be judged on their merits, wholly apart from temperance reform."

He agreed with the hon. Member. He could not honestly get up and say that this was a great temperance measure. It was, however, a great scheme of financial reform, and he wished to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer his thanks for the way he had carried on this measure, for the surpassing ability and patience with which he had fought it, and he hoped in an hour or two he would have his reward by seeing the failure of this extraordinary combination which he had described. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see the certain triumph of the great measure he had brought in, and also see that if the House of Commons were left to itself and not brow-beaten and ridden over by any other place, it would be willing and able to pass great measures for the benefit of the people of this country.

*MR. BONSOR (Surrey, Wimbledon) said, he had not come down with a set speech like the hon. Baronet who had just spoken, nor had he that vivid imagination which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had displayed in his speech. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman suggested that the Mover of the Amendment they were discussing (Colonel Lockwood) was put up by the Member for Wimbledon. He could only assure the Committee that until yesterday he had no conversation with the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He was absent from the House the whole of last week; he had no idea the hon. and gallant Gentleman was going to move this Amendment; and if he had he should have insisted on him moving the rejection of the whole 6d. instead of taking two bites at a cherry. The imagination of the right hon. Gentleman went even further, and he quoted his (Mr. Bonsor's) speech upon the Second Reading of the Bill, and imagined that the various articles he enumerated in his speech were used in brewing, and that consequently there was a large margin left for profit. He stated, after having listened for some time to what he might almost call a personal appeal from the right hon. Gentleman to himself, that in his own firm the proportion of sugar that they used to malt was exceedingly small. He had since refreshed his memory on the subject, and he found that while his figures were very nearly accurate he could also inform the House that the sugar his firm used in brewing was of the very finest quality. [Laughter.] If hon. Gentlemen would only wait for the end of the sentence they would know why he said so. Sugar was used by his firm only in the most expensive beers they sold, and nothing but malt and hops were used in the cheaper beers that were really the food of the British public. He would go further. The right hon. Gentleman might say as, indeed, he said in his speech, "Why, then, are you so foolish as not to use those cheap articles and improve your profits by so doing?" He would answer the right hon. Gentleman. He had not the imagination of the right hon. Gentleman. He trusted he was a practical man of business, and his business experience had taught him that the self-interest of a manufacturer was to preserve his capital intact. If he lowered the quality of his article he injured his customers' credit; and he injured his own capital by injuring his customers. The right hon. Gentleman, again, asked "Why are these brewers' meetings held if you do not intend to pay this tax?" He again informed the right hon. Gentleman that it was because he valued his customers and the trade they did, and their customers who were the British public. If the right hon. Gentleman would increase this taxation up to a point where the brewing industry could not afford to pay it the brewing industry would, as he said in his speech on the Second Reading of the Bill, get other ingredients from which to brew their beer, and he ventured to say that, after all, those other ingredients would not make as good an article as was made of English hops and malt. The right hon. Gentleman, no doubt, was incredulous, but might he put a point to him upon a subject which possibly he knew better than he knew brewing. The right hon. Gentleman was aware of what happened in the claret trade. He was aware of the introduction of enormous quantities of light claret into this country. He was aware that light claret was knocked down in price to a point at which there was absolutely no profit, that the quality suffered, and that the public refused to drink it. The right hon. Gentleman would also know very well that, at the present time, there were various brands of champagne before the country. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman, though he evidently did not drink beer, sometimes drank a glass of champagne. [Sir W. HARCOURT shook his head.] The right hon. Gentleman had not even that experience. But he would venture to say this: that any hon. Gentleman in this House who went to the house of a friend and drank a glass of champagne expected to get a good glass of champagne; he went upon the credit of the house where he was entertained, and it took him some time before he found out that the article was not good. It was exactly the same with the consumer of British beer; if he was continually given beer brewed from cheaper articles, he would eventually cease to drink it, and the Revenue as well as the brewers would suffer. The right hon. Gentleman had founded the whole of his argument in his first speech upon the point that this was a direct tax upon the brewer. To-night he was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman argue in favour of indirect taxation. He did not understand how the right hon. Gentleman could reconcile a direct tax upon the brewer with his argument of this indirect taxation. If, in the first instance, the right hon. Gentleman had said that he was imposing a large amount of direct taxation in his Death Duties, and then turned round and said, "I must look for a certain amount of indirect taxation, and I shall put an indirect tax upon the consumers of spirits and beer—I shall look to the brewers and distillers to collect that tax for me"—he certainly would not be now speaking. But the right hon. Gentleman had gone out of his way to say that this was a direct tax upon brewers and a direct tax upon licensed victuallers, and he had quoted figures across the floor of the House to show that the brewers and licensed victuallers were well able to pay this extra direct taxation. The Committee had only to do with the Beer Tax this evening. The right hon. Gentleman knew as well as he did that the Beer Tax of 6d. extra a barrel—minimised as it might be by the hon. Baronet opposite—if it was a direct tax upon the brewer, amounted to an extra Income Tax of 1s. 3d. in the £1 on the profits of the brewer. The right hon. Gentleman quoted figures regarding the Income Tax Returns of 1883 and 1884, and of 1893 and 1894. He could well understand that he chose the years 1883 and 1884. The right hon. Gentleman did not inform the House that the year 1882 was a year of hop famine, and that the year 1883-4 was absolutely the worst year in the way of profit-making that brewers had ever experienced in this country. He did not inform the House as regarded the capital of those 2,300 assessments—

SIR W. HARCOURT: The year I quoted was 1884-5. It showed £6,316,000, and the year 1893-4 showed £10,177,000.

MR. BONSOR said, the year 1882 came in the three years' assessment. The right hon. Gentleman must know that he had taken the most exceptional figures in favour of his own case.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg pardon. If the hon. Gentleman wishes it, in order to avoid that average, I will take 1886-7, when the produce was £6,802,000, as against £10,177,000 in 1893-4.

MR. BONSOR said, the right hon. Gentleman did quote a figure upon which he got the lowest possible average, because if he took the following year it would have risen £700,000 on his own valuation. The Committee would understand the prejudice with which the right hon. Gentleman had approached the whole of this subject. The right hon. Gentleman had gone out of his way to make a direct attack on the trade, and, he might almost say, a direct attack upon himself as an individual. The right hon. Gentleman went out of his way to inform the Committee that he had dominated, in the first instance, his hon. and gallant Friend who moved this Amendment. He afterwards went on to say that he was dominating the country by a system of boycotting. He did not know what the right hon. Gentleman referred to, but his speech showed that he was acting with extreme prejudice against the brewing industry. He had only to say this: that, so far as he was able to collect figures, the profits of brewers at the present time were not the same as they were five years ago. The right hon. Gentleman had founded the whole of his argument upon these exceptional profits. He had taken 2,300 assessments out of 16,000 brewers in 1885-6, and 10,000 brewers who took out licences at the present time. He did not know how the right hon. Gentleman could reconcile those figures before the Committee, and he would strongly urge the right hon. Gentleman to give a Committee of this House to investigate those figures, and to abide by the result of that Committee, and he would undertake to say that, so far as he knew anything of the London trade, the assessments on the Income Tax of the London trade would prove less than they were five years ago. And yet the right hon. Gentleman based the whole of his argument upon the exceptional profits made by the brewers at the present moment, leaving out the remaining 8,000 brewers to whom he had alluded. The right hon. Gentleman threw a taunt at the big brewers of the country, and said they wanted to exterminate the smaller brewers. All he could say was this: that they had no wish to exterminate the smaller brewers. They were actuated by exactly the same feelings as every other trade was actuated by, and had no wish to drive the smaller competitors out of the market. It was to the right hon. Gentleman and the continuous extra taxation that this continuous disorganisation of trade was due. Speaking as a brewer, he said that there was no particular fun or pleasure in being a brewer. One was naturally assailed by the hon. Baronet opposite and by the right hon. Gentleman. One was naturally taunted with one's great wealth and power; but all he said was this: that so long as he was a brewer, he intended to brew for profit, and did not intend to brew at a loss. If he could employ his money better he would do so. This tax would not ultimately fall upon the brewing industry—though it was an irritating tax to it—but upon another industry after another harvest. He did not oppose the tax as a brewer. If the right hon. Gentleman called upon the brewers to collect an increased tax they would do it, as they had done before; but to inform them that it was a direct tax upon them and their trade they absolutely repudiated, and they told him that they were not prepared to pay it, and that they were not going to pay it. He thought there was nothing like plain speaking on this subject, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that if he thought he was going to crush the brewing industry by imposing this tax upon them he was absolutely mistaken. He cordially supported the Amendment.

*MR. WHITTAKER (York, W.R., Spen Valley) said, that money for Imperial purposes had to be raised somehow and from some source. If it was not raised on liquor, it must be obtained elsewhere. The point was, where was it to come from? The natural objection to a tax was that it would injure some particular trading class. Could that be said of liquor in the present case? He thought not. The experience of the past was that a small tax like this did not check trade. In 1889 the tax on beer was increased 2d. a gallon, but the sale of beer increased steadily for three years after the tax was increased, as compared with the previous five years. In 1890 an extra 6d. was put on spirits, nevertheless the sale increased in the following three years, as compared with the previous five years. The tax would not check the trade, unless the price was raised to the consumer; and it had been admitted that that would not be done. The tax would not be an undue burden on a particular class. The trade on which it would fall was an especially prosperous and an especially wealthy trade. The hon. Gentleman who had just spoken disputed that point, and questioned the figures quoted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But there were other tests. He would like to ask whether the retail selling price of liquor had fallen in the same way as the selling price of other articles manufactured in other trades? [Mr. BONSOR: It has.]

He thought the working man did not find, at any rate, that he got his glass of beer across the counter cheaper than before. He would take another test as to whether this trade could bear a special tax and whether it was prosperous and wealthy. This test was to be found in the dividends paid by public Brewery Companies whose Reports had been published, and the figures proved that the last few years had been specially profitable for the Companies. They should remember that it was not now-a-days necessary to show that a trade was making larger profits to prove that it was better off as compared with other trades. If a trade in these depressed times only held its ground it was well off, but if it made larger profits it was indeed exceptional. He would show that the liquor trade was in that exceptional position. The Atkinson Company, of Birmingham, in 1890 paid 8 per cent., in 1891 9 per cent., in 1892 10 per cent., in 1893 12½ per cent. The Birkenhead Brewery Company in 1889 paid 8 per cent., in 1890 8 per cent., in 1891-92 9 per cent., in 1893 10 per cent. Clarkson's Brewery paid 8 per cent. in 1891, 9 per cent. in 1892, and 12 per cent. in 1893. The Commercial Brewery, Stepney, paid 7½ per cent., 8½ per cent., and 9 per cent. Dunville, in Ireland, had paid a steady 20 per cent. A brewery at Grantham had paid 9 and 11 per cent.; the New Westminster Brewery 8 and 10 per cent.; Tennant's, at Sheffield, paid 8 per cent. in 1889-90, 9 per cent. in 1891, 10 per cent. in 1892-93. M'Ewan, of Edinburgh, paid 10 per cent. in 1890-91, and 15 per cent. in 1892-93. The Kirkstall Brewery paid 10 per cent. in 1886, and 15 per cent. in 1887, 20 per cent. in 1888-89, 25 per cent. in 1890-91, and 27½ per cent. in 1892-93. The Albion Brewery paid 12½ per cent. in 1889, and 16½ per cent. in 1891-92-93.

MR. BARTLEY; Can the hon. Gentleman give us the profits of Whitbread & Co.?

MR. WHITTAKER said, he could. The profits of Whitbread & Co. in 1891-92 were 12 per cent., and in 1893 13 per cent. No other business in the country showed similar progress in the dividends paid. They had been told that evening that the average return on capital invested in breweries was 7 per cent. Accepting that as a correct statement, he would point out that the average return on railway investments was slightly under 4 per cent. It was an especially prosperous trade, and especially prosperous during a time when other trades had not been prosperous. It was, moreover, a temporary tax, and it was consequently only fair that it should be put on the backs of those who were best able to bear it. On fiscal, and not temperance, grounds, it was a tax that could only be regarded as fair and just, falling as it did on one of the most prosperous trades in the country.

SIR F. MILNER (Notts, Bassetlaw) held that brewers were not asking for exceptional treatment at the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They were not even asking for equal treatment. They were asking for something like just and fair play. He thought that they would find when the Division took place that there was a very considerable minority in the House, including hon. Members on the other side of the House, who were in favour of the principle of justice to brewers as well as to others, and he might further say that but for the fact that a certain section of Members in that House were bound to support any proposal that the Government might make, without regard to argument or considerations of justice, the majority in favour of the Amendment would be very considerable. Those who were connected with the brewing and licensed victualling trade generally had occasionally been termed the milch cow of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That cow had been a very patient, prolific, and uncomplaining beast in the past. She had ministered to the necessities of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for many years past, and on more than one occasion she had saved a Chancellor of the Exchequer from confusion and the State from bankruptcy. But there had never yet lived a cow which could not be drained dry, and some day, if Chancellors of the Exchequer persisted in making up every deficiency that might take place by placing a tax upon the brewing and the distilling interest, they would find that they had killed the cow that gave the golden milk. The Chancellor of the Exchequer justified these fresh impositions on the liquor trade because the brewers and distillers were successful in business. But he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that there were other vocations which were equally successful. Personally, he did not profess to be a financier, and he did not suppose it was a sound system of finance, but he admitted that in a case where a large additional sum of money was to be raised for the expenses of the country it was perfectly justifiable that the principal burden should be placed on those who were most able to bear it. But, in the present instance, he thought the burden should be shared equally amongst all those who had sufficient means at their disposal to provide the necessary funds. He would remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer that a good many other commercial men, however, had been successful in business besides brewers, and why should these be called upon exclusively to meet the demands of the Exchequer? There was an hon. Baronet on the Ministerial side of the House who represented one of the divisions of Whitechapel, and who had been uncommonly successful as a banker, and many brewers would be most thankful to exchange their incomes and dividends with him. Why did not the Chancellor of the Exchequer turn his attention to the tax-paying capabilities of the class to which the hon. Baronet belonged? He thought it was unjust to always put increased taxes on the same trade whenever it was necessary to increase the revenue. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in justifying the tax, dealt with the enormous profits made in the brewing trade. But the right hon. Gentleman took those figures from a person who, as it turned out, knew as little of the business he had been talking about as the right hon. Gentleman himself; and it had been proved that the statistics were absolutely incorrect. He admitted that in the past enormous profits had been made by certain firms in the brewing trade, and if it were only those houses that were hit by the increased tax, though still unjust, it might be condoned. But for one that had made a large fortune in the trade there were enormous numbers who found it difficult, especially in later years, to make the two ends meet; and he thought some consideration should be shown to those struggling traders. This tax would press very heavily on the small traders, and he believed that in many cases they would be driven out of the trade altogether. The strong advocates of temperance would admit that there was something in what he said. It was not desirable to drive out the smaller class of brewers from the trade. The small brewer was very particular as to the quality of the beer he turned out and the character of his houses. It meant ruin to him if the quality of his beer was not suitable to his customers, or if, through houses being badly conducted, he lost his licences. Although the large brewers were particular in these respects there was a greater incentive to the small brewers to see after such matters. In driving them out of the trade the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be doing as injustice to them and an injury to the cause of temperance. The brewer, no doubt, would use every effort to minimise the effect of this Bill upon himself. He would have recourse to substitutes for malt and hops; at any rate, he would be unwilling to give the same price for his barley as formerly, and he was certain that this very year they would see a considerable fall in the price of barley. That meant, of course, a very serious thing indeed for the agricultural industry. He was not saying this for the mere sake of saying it, but he was speaking from his own knowledge, when he said that the agricultural interest would suffer through this measure far more than the brewing interest. There was also another objection to the tax—namely, that its effect would be to reduce the quality of the beer. He was aware that with certain hon. Gentlemen opposite that argument was useless, and that hon. Members who were professors for water did not believe that there was another side of the question at all. He had drunk water and had contracted a serious attack of typhoid fever, from the effects of which he was likely always to suffer, and the only time he was ever the worse for liquor was after indulging in three bottles of a temperance beverage called ginger ale. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, speaking to his constituents the other day, said—

“The brewers and distillers are crying out very loudly against this tax. I think the professional man has far more reason for grumbling, if grumbling there is to be. I am a professional man myself, and I think I have far more reason for grumbling than the brewers have. My reason for grumbling is having to pay an extra penny on the Income Tax, while the brewer and distiller have to pay an extra 6d. on their whisky or beer.”

But the right hon. Gentleman forgot that the unfortunate brewer and distiller had to pay the extra 1d. in the Income Tax as well as the extra tax on the commodity he manufactured. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle did not appreciate the injustice of the tax which was being put upon the brewers' trade in addition to the Income Tax. He believed the Division would show that there was a large minority of hon. Gentlemen who recognised that every legitimate trade ought to receive fair treatment, and that it was not right or fair for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to always impose additional taxes on the same trade in order to raise the revenue which might be necessary.

MR. WHITBREAD (Bedford) said, he would like to say a few words, although he saw the House was getting somewhat impatient for the close of the Debate. [Cries of "No!"] In the first place, he would like to endeavour to remove some misapprehensions which he thought existed in the minds of hon. Members, and perhaps the public mind, in regard to the statements which were made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a previous occasion in dealing with this tax. He did not at all believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken up the matter with any prejudice against the brewer or the distiller. The right hon. Gentleman had, he thought, the other day, quite fairly and properly laid down the doctrine on which a Chancellor of the Exchequer should act. He said that a Chancellor of the Exchequer ought not to act from moral considerations or any feelings of that sort. He ought to be guided by fiscal considerations alone. No doubt that was true. On a former occasion the Chancellor of the Exchequer used words which were very apt to lead to a false impression. He referred to the occasion when the right hon. Gentleman was speaking of the ordinary profits made by the trade in London. He had no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman's emissary made his calculations with perfect accuracy, but the effect of the speech was to leave the impression that 80 per cent., 90 per cent., 150 per cent., and 230 per cent. was a profit which applied to the whole business of the publican. That was, of course, the greatest possible error. The right hon. Gentleman could not have intended to convey the idea that this was the profit upon all the articles sold by the licensed victualler. He ventured to say that in any trade there was some single article upon which the profits were larger than upon others, and that in many cases articles were sold at a loss. In many cases some one article bore a profit out of all proportion to that upon others. He desired to illustrate this meaning, and, looking round, he cast his eyes upon tea, and he ventured to ask, What was the profit upon a cup of tea? Upon inquiry he found that in the humbler establishments a pint mug of tea, with sugar and milk, varied in the London district from 1d. to 1½d. In other places, a little higher in the scale, without going to Piccadilly, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer did for his illustration and his samples, he found that a half-pint mug was sold for 2d. and at other places higher up still for 3d.

An hon. MEMBER: What is it in the House of Commons?

MR. WHITBREAD said, he would not venture to inquire into that subject. Possibly the frequenters of the Tea Room could say something upon that subject; but when the Chancellor of the Exchequer talked of a profit on spirits of from 90 per cent. in Mile End to 230 per cent. in Piccadilly, he ventured to remind him that the profits upon a cup of tea bore no proportion to those figures. In the humblest establishments where tea was sold at 1d. per pint the profit was never so small as 230 per cent. It ran up to three times the highest figures which the right hon. Gentleman had mentioned as the profit on brandy in Piccadilly. No one in his senses, however, would argue that therefore the people who kept coffee-houses and who sold tea were making undue profits all round, and ought to be taxed? Many articles were sold not only not at a profit, but really at a loss; and everyone knew that there was rent to pay, light to be found, service to be provided. In their case it would be absurd to hold up the profit on a single article and so argue that those establishments where they made immense profits upon one article made them upon all. But he would remind the Committee that in the case of tea it was a voluntary subscription. People need not drink tea any more than they need drink alcoholic liquors. If they did not like the national beverage they could always fall back upon the natural beverage, sometimes with a good supply of nature in it too. He had dwelt so long upon this point because he could not help thinking that there was a good deal of fallacy about the figures quoted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he would ask the House to apply the same considerations to the case of the publican as they did to that of the coffee-house-keeper. They had no right to apply any other rule—they had no right on a question of taxation to import any outside feeling, but they were bound to do strict justice all round. He hoped the Committee would act in that spirit. Then as to the profits of the brewers. He had no means of testing the figures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Last year, no doubt, was a singularly successful year, but it was not a question whether the profits of the trade had grown in 10 years from £6,000,000 to £10,000,000 per annum, but what was the profit upon each £100 worth of capital? The Chancellor of the Exchequer never touched upon that point, but what he would tell him was this, that while the materials had been cheaper—much cheaper than they were—the cost of conveying the liquor brewed to the public had become enormously larger. In the 10 years this cost had exceeded by a far larger ratio the profits. The two things were quite compatible. As materials got cheaper and as profits increased brewers were compelled to bid higher prices for the houses which were the channels for conveying the liquor to the consumers. Thus, the net profits now made on £1,000 of capital invested in the brewing trade were not so great as they were 10 years ago. The whole argument used was that the brewers were to be taxed because they were making large profits. But what about others? Was there no one else making profits? He had seen Chancellors of the Exchequer following each other, and there was a sort of family likeness between them all. He thought there was a sad lack of fertility and invention on the part of Chancellors of the Exchequer. The moment right hon. Gentlemen were in a difficulty they had recourse to the brewer and distiller. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer had, no doubt, opened a new line in one direction, but was his ingenuity exhausted when he had made the dead hand relax a little? Was there no living hand that could be made to relax? What about the bankers? Why should not his right hon. Friend turn his attention to them? He thought that his right hon. Friend would find that the bankers were making far larger profits than the brewers. Personally, he did not object to paying his share in respect to the demand made for increased armaments, but he thought that turn and turn about would be a very good rule to apply in regard to increases of taxation, and he thought that some of his hon. Friends should stir up the Chancellor of the Exchequer to see whether some other class could not be made to share the burden. The efforts which had been made on former occasions by former Chancellors of the Exchequer had not encouraged the right hon. Gentleman. They had tried to put a tax upon matches, but the proposal was not popular. They had tried to put a tax on wheels, but the hon. Member for Southwark put a spoke in that. But the brewers and distillers should not always be specially selected for these imposts. They all knew that it was the cry for an increased Navy that called for the present increase in taxation. Although Englishmen had a healthy habit of under-estimating themselves and over-estimating their neighbours, still he did think that the cry was warranted in the present case, by reason of the insufficiency of the margin. He was not ashamed that he joined in the cry for an increased Navy, but he did so with his eyes open. He knew that the cost of the increase could not be met out of the ordinary Revenue, and he quite expected his branch of trade to be called on for a contribution. Indeed, he could hardly remember an instance when they had not been called upon to bear a share in any new taxation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in proposing the increased tax on liquor, stated that it was intended to fill a gap between the present and the time when the Death Duties would be in full bearing. He (Mr. Whitbread) and some of his friends thought it would be a point of great importance to secure that the intention thus announced should be put into plain words in the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman consented to this, and he thought they had secured a most valuable concession, and one which was not often given to them. As a friend of the Government, having gone to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and received the concession, they could not turn round and treat the whole matter as some hon.

Gentlemen opposite did. If he were to do so, he would say there was an end to asking for concessions, as there certainly would be to obtaining any. This was not the first time, and it would not be the last, that they would have a contest with the Government, and if he and those who assisted him in obtaining the concession from his right hon. Friend were to act in such a way, they would be doing something very wrong in their own interests. A great difference of opinion existed as to who would pay the tax. He spoke for himself in this matter. Much depended upon whether the brewers believed the tax would really be for one year only. If they believed that, he could not help thinking that any successful man would hesitate a long time before he altered the gravity or quality of his beer or the material he used for the sake of avoiding a temporary impost which was to terminate at the end of the year. If, however, it was to be an impost laid upon them permanently, he did not say that competition might not drive all brewers to try to get cheaper materials. But for a temporary impost, he thought that, as a mere matter of trade expediency, it would be a great mistake to take such a risky step as to alter the quality of the beer.

MR. BARTON (Armagh, Mid) said, he was sure that those who represented the shareholders in any of the great Brewery Companies must appreciate the arguments of the hon. Member who had just sat down; but, at the same time, they would naturally ask how the hon. Member proposed to reconcile the vote which he was about to give with the arguments he had used. The hon. Gentleman had said plainly that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had based his proposals upon facts and figures which he felt bound to contradict.

MR. WHITBREAD: I have not contradicted a single figure that the right hon. Gentleman has laid before the Committee.

MR. BARTON said that, in any case, the right hon. Gentleman's figures did not support his case. The right hon. Gentleman had made imputations against the brewers of this country, against which they had been unable until that moment to defend themselves. The right hon. Gentleman had throughout misrepresented the position of the brewers, and had placed them before the country in a false light. It was a most grave matter that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should, for the first time, have sought to put a direct tax upon a particular class of traders. All the right hon. Gentleman's arguments were in favour of indirect taxation, but his proposal undoubtedly was to impose a direct tax upon brewers, and not an indirect tax upon the consumers. He should like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman whether he proposed this tax as one that would fall upon the brewer or as one that would fall upon the consumer? The right hon. Gentleman had to-night rested his case upon the large profits which he said were made by the brewers, but he had arrived at his figures by taking the profits which the brewers made in the year 1883-84, which was the worst year they had ever had, and comparing them with those of 1893, which was a fairly prosperous year. That was a course which was very likely to mislead the country upon the question. The right hon. Gentleman said that the large brewers were crushing out the small brewers, but it was clear that a heavy increase in the taxation of any particular trade must necessarily ruin the smaller traders. The right hon. Gentleman had further said that the fact that the larger brewers held tied houses would account for the smaller brewers going to the wall, and he quoted the case of a firm of which he (Mr. Barton) was a director. But in the case of Guinness and Co. the firm held no tied houses at all, and although there were very few tied houses in Ireland, the smaller brewers in that country were being rapidly crushed out of existence. The suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, he was afraid, simply made in order to import prejudice into this discussion. Then the right hon. Gentleman had referred to the deterioration of the materials used in the manufacture of beer. Here, again, he would point out that in Ireland nothing but malt and hops were used, and the taste of the people was so good that they would at once discover if the materials of which the beer was made were deteriorated. But many brewers would be found to deteriorate their materials in order to bear the tax; and not only would the consumer suffer, but the farmer also, because good barley would no longer be used. The effect of this policy would be that the honest trader would suffer, and the trader who resorted to other methods would escape. He must complain of the insults which throughout the Debate the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thrown at those engaged in the trade which he was intending to tax. But the brewers and the distillers were, in that respect, in company with the landed interests and the colonists, for everyone who was injured by the Budget had met with scant courtesy at the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. From the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman it might be supposed that the liquor trade paid nothing to the Revenue of the country, instead of from a quarter to a third of the whole. It was not just to say that the brewers wanted to resist taxation altogether. Their point was that the burden at present thrown upon them was as heavy as they could reasonably be expected to bear. He did not say that in case of emergency they would not readily take upon themselves fresh burdens; but in this case there was no emergency, and he contended that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was doing a great injury to the country, because in a time of tranquillity he was drawing on the reserves of taxation which would be needed in case of national emergency.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, he thought he should be justified in recalling the attention of the Committee to the subject of the Amendment as it was moved in the first instance. For some hours in the course of the Debate they had been listening to speeches as to the effect of the tax upon the great brewing industry. The Amendment was never intended to bring in the brewing industry at all. It was absolutely an agricultural Amendment. The course which the Debate had taken showed how difficult it was to obtain the attention of hon. Members opposite for any agricultural question. Their contention was that farmers had a direct interest in this Amendment, because this fresh impost of the Chancellor of the Exchequer must have one of two results. It would either decrease the price paid by the brewer for the raw material, or it would increase the price paid by the consumer for that which the brewer produced. Within the last few days it had been stated that there had been in Scotland and the North of England a decrease of 5s. a quarter in the price of barley, and that that decrease was due to the Budget proposals. That was quite enough to justify the Committee in regarding the Amendment as an agricultural Amendment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had discussed this matter from the point of view of the consumers, but he neglected the point of view of the producer of the raw material. To the right hon. Gentleman the landed interest was what King Charles's head was to Mr. Dick—he could not discuss anything without dragging it in. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had most unjustly taunted the landed interest with being unwilling to bear its fair share of the burden of taxation, and he had contrasted that with the willingness that had been shown to throw a full share on personalty. But it was most unfair to make such a comparison between the two kinds of property. The right hon. Gentleman knew well that it would be easy to enable personalty, in many ways, to evade the tax, but that land could not possibly do so. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to the Returns of the brewers as compared with those of ordinary trade, but the weight of this impost would fall, not so much on the brewers and distillers as on the land—on the producers of the raw material, the farmers of the country. The agriculturist in every part of the country would suffer from it directly, immediately, and most seriously. Those who voted for the Amendment would be voting in defence of the agricultural interest, which, he contended, had been most unfairly attacked, and upon which it was most unjust and unwise that this extra burden should be thrown. In that spirit he gave the Amendment his most hearty support; at the same time venturing to remind the Committee that those who voted against it would be voting directly against the agricultural interest.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he only spoke in the agricultural interest, but he wanted at the outset to correct an hon. Gentleman who spoke of the enormous profits made by the Kirkstall brewery, and to say that the percentage he had quoted was by no means always maintained. With regard to the deterioration of materials, he might at all events point out that whether beer was brewed from acetic acid, or rice, or glucose, or sugar, the agricultural interest was always the sufferer. He would not trouble hon. Members with a jeremiad upon agricultural depression, but he would remind them that after all this tax would fall mainly, if not altogether, on that interest, and through it on the agricultural labourer, in whom hon. Gentlemen opposite assumed so much interest. The result of the right hon. Gentleman's proposals would be to place an enormous tax on barley, and the last straw upon the back of the agricultural interest. He very much regretted that the hon. and gallant Member for the Epping Division had not endeavoured to remove the whole of the proposed impost instead of seeking to reduce it by one-half only.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, he had observed that many hon. Members had been standing up for beer, but he wanted to say a word on behalf of porter. He was told that this taxation would fall upon porter rather than upon beer. They were going to make these beverages more expensive; and what would become of the money they raised? Were they going to spend it in the dockyards? He objected to this proposal because it would raise the price of porter to his constituents. Also he objected to the statement that the price of barley would be raised, because it seemed to him that the brewers would have to leave off using barley and go instead to maize and other substitutes.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): There are one or two matters connected with this point to which I should like to call attention. So far as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has based his argument upon the fact that brewers' profits are great, and that therefore they are a fit object of taxation, I take entire exception to the theory which he has put forward. I do not think it is sound finance to say, because one particular class is making great profits, that that particular class ought to be subject to extra taxation. If the right hon. Gentleman pushed that argument the interesting speech of the hon. Member for Bedford would be very much to the point. Are we in these Debates to have the representatives of various classes pointing to the profits of other classes and saying, "That is the class to be selected for the impost of the Chancellor of the Exchequer?" It has been interesting to discover whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer means to tax the brewers or to impose indirect taxation. If he contends that this duty is to be paid by the brewers, I do not think it is indirect taxation, but it is in the character of Income Tax. Is it the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that because brewers make such great profits they ought to be subject to a heavier Income Tax? There has been no speech to-night more interesting than that of the hon. Member for Bedford. I was in doubt as I listened to the arguments which the hon. Member directed against the arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the hon. Member would conclude his interesting observations. The natural conclusion was that he would vote against the proposals of the Government. [Ministerial cries of "No!" and Opposition laughter.] I contend that the hon. Member challenged the whole argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and proved that the right hon. Gentleman had made unfounded calculations with regard to brewers' profits. I know my hon. Friend too well to think he was trying to make capital with the trade, while he was at the same time supporting Her Majesty's Government. He had a genuine feeling that this tax was inequitable: but he had been squared not in so many words, because he was a great master of phrase, but he had been squared. He had approached the Chancellor of the Exchequer and obtained what he called a concession, that the tax was to be temporary. The value of that concession made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer depends upon the Government which may be in power when the time comes to renew the tax. I am sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not in a position to give those guarantees which the hon. Member desires. Has the Chancellor of the Exchequer given a promise or not that this is to be only a temporary tax? We on this side are as much entitled as hon. Members opposite to know what are the pledges of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Let me examine the attitude of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the duties which are being imposed under this Budget. The right hon. Gentleman was challenged by an hon. Member on this side of the House with regard to the Death Duties, and he was asked whether they might be made temporary, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that, in his opinion, it would not be good finance. That was with regard to the Death Duties; but what language has the Chancellor of the Exchequer held to the Member for Bedford? He is prepared to say with regard to the Death Duties that it would be bad finance to give them a temporary character, but when he wishes to secure the votes of the brewers—his friends behind us—then it is a very different question. Then he is prepared, notwithstanding the manifold disadvantages of a temporary tax, to make this concession. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean business as regards this point or not? I think it is extremely doubtful finance to make any promise of that kind. But how far do they go? What is their policy? We do not know what their policy is. Do they mean to continue to impose the whole of this tax on the brewers, or does the right hon. Gentleman consider this a part of the indirect taxation which ought to be supported by those who wish that direct and indirect taxation should simultaneously be passed by the House? The Chancellor of the Exchequer appealed to the Opposition, and said, "Are you prepared to vote only for direct taxation without imposing any indirect taxation at all?" I do hold that indirect taxation should accompany direct taxation. The right hon. Gentleman made a special appeal to the financial authorities on this side of the House, and asked, "How would you supplement any deficit in the Budget caused by the omission of a tax of this kind?" I do not think that question has ever been replied to by the Opposition. The Opposition is not to be called upon to give a counter Budget, but I may say that the right hon. Gentleman and his friends are completely in error when they declare that they see no alternative between imposing this tax and increasing the Tea or Tobacco Duty. Financial resources are not exhausted to that extent. It appears to be supposed that there are certain stereotyped duties in this country, and those the only ones, with which you can deal. I admit that the discovery of new taxes, or old taxes in a new form, is an extremely difficult and ticklish operation. But I do enter my protest against the view that all our financial expedients are so exhausted that there is nothing else to be done than to increase some of the old duties. That would be a discreditable admission to have to make, and I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman himself is prepared to push that point. If we were called upon to make up this deficit, I believe we should be able to supply the deficit caused by diminishing this tax by one-half. [Several hon. MEMBERS: By what means?] Hon. Members opposite want me to disclose my tactics. They must remember the doctrine of Sir Robert Peel, "The physician does not give a prescription until he has been called in." Should it be our duty, I do venture to think that we could give a prescription which would free us from the injustices and inequalities which attach to the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I thoroughly sympathise with the right hon. Gentleman, knowing as I do the difficulty of finding new resources. It would be uncandid on my part not to admit that; but, at the same time, I do not admit that unless we accept this Budget wholesale we shall be driven to such expedients as hon. Members opposite appear to regard as the only substitute for the finance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is great hardship in the proposal to put this particular tax on brewers, and I say that having myself the had the misfortune of being compelled to impose increased taxation on that class, I do think, that having been selected for increased taxation three or four years ago, it hard and unjust that that particular class should again be selected in order to supply the needs of the Exchequer. Why did not the Government boldly say that the consumer ought to pay? Why did they not say, "We appeal to the masses of the country, and we say that in their Beer and Spirit Duty they ought also to bear their share of increased taxation?" They have been afraid to take up that ground. They have disguised their policy from the masses, and they have said, "It is the rich brewers who shall pay." Why did they not say, "The masses as well as the propertied classes are interested in the defence of the country. We call upon you to make good your contribution to the defence, for we know your patriotism is equal to that of the other classes?" They have not done that; they have called upon a particular class, exaggerating their property, and in that they have followed the same line of policy they have followed in other parts of the Budget—that wealth is able to pay, is unwilling to pay, and must be compelled to pay. This policy does not commend itself to our side of the House. All classes would be willing to pay, and anxious to pay. The Government have not fairly faced the question of direct and indirect taxation in the imposition of a new tax, and they have evaded it by the expedient of imposing one duty upon another.

SEA FISHERIES (SHELL FISH) BILL. (No. 274.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I object.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): I hope the hon. and gallant Gentleman will not persist in his objection. I am sure that if he has any observations to make the House will be glad to hear him. There is a very general desire that this Bill should be passed. It will be useful to fishermen in every part of the Kingdom.

MAJOR RASCH: I regret to have to impede any Bill which is promoted by the right hon. Gentleman, but we must draw the line somewhere. If the right hon. Gentleman will put down the Bill as the first Order to-morrow I will withdraw my objection, but otherwise I must persist in it.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House do now adjourn.”

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he intended to take the Railway Bill to-morrow, and, if not, when he intended to take it?

MR. BRYCE: No, Sir; I do not think I shall take it to-morrow, and I hardly know yet when I shall take it. I think it will be possible to do so on Thursday.

SIR J. WHITEHEAD (Leicester): Will the right hon. Gentleman give us due notice when he will take it?

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton): Can the right hon. Gentleman say when it will be taken?

MR. BRYCE: I will endeavour to let the House know a day or two beforehand.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 27th June 1894.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

BARRY DOCK AND RAILWAYS ACT, 1888 (AMENDMENT) BILL [Lords].

CONSIDERATION.

MR. A. J. WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.) said, he desired to move a Resolution standing in his name on the Paper to re-commit the Bill to the former Committee—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member's Motion does not refer to the Bill now before the House.

MR. A. J. WILLIAMS: My Motion relates to the Bill, a Report on which has come down from a Committee of this House.

*MR. SPEAKER: This is not the Bill. This is a Bill from the Lords. I have the highest authority for saying this is not the Bill the hon. Member refers to.

As amended, considered; to be read the third time.

RIVER SUCK DRAINAGE BILL.

CONSIDERATION.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Can any Member of the Government tell us what this Bill is about?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): It is to extend the borrowing powers in order to admit of the completion of the works.

As amended, considered.

Ordered, That Standing Orders 223 and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the third time.—(Dr. Farquharson.)

Bill read the third time, and passed.

BARRY RAILWAY BILL [Lords].

MR. A. J. WILLIAMS said, he begged to move—

"That the Barry Railway Bill [Lords] be re-committed to the former Committee, and that the Committee have leave to sit and proceed forthwith.

VOL. XXVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

That it be an Instruction to the Committee to hear the case of the Glamorgan County Council, Petitioners against the Bill, and that the Committee have power to insert a Clause providing that the railways of the company shall be adapted and opened for the convenience of passenger traffic within such reasonable period as the Committee shall think fit."

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Motion must stand over until Friday next.

THE RIVERS POLLUTION BILL AND THE LEICESTER COUNTY COUNCIL.

SIR J. WHITEHEAD (Leicester) said, he desired to present a Petition from the Borough of Leicester, which contained 180,000 inhabitants, objecting to be placed, so far as the Rivers Pollution Bill was concerned, under the County Council, a body which had little sympathy with, and less knowledge of, the requirements of urban communities. They preferred to be, as now, under the Local Government Board. They thought the present jurisdiction—the County Court, with an appeal to the High Court—to be distinctly better than what was proposed in the new Bill—namely, the Bench of Magistrates, with appeal to what was practically the same body—that is, the Magistrates in Quarter Sessions.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is only usual in presenting a Petition to state its general purport.

SIR J. WHITEHEAD said, he would only add that the Leicester Corporation had no fear on their own account, inasmuch as their sewage was purified splendidly over a farm of 1,600 acres.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.—(No. 190.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 26th June.]

[TWENTIETH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

*DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire) said, that in moving to leave out the words "Great Britain" in order to insert "England," it would be obvious to the Committee that his intention was to exempt Scotland from the proposed increase of the Spirit Duty. He had taken this course for two special reasons. The first was, that he considered Scotland already much too heavily taxed for Imperial purposes as compared with England; and, secondly, he thought that this proposed tax was out of all proportion on the beverage of the Scotch people as compared with the beverage of the English people. In an able paper contributed some time ago to The Scottish Review a well-known financier went into statistics on the subject. He pointed out clearly and indisputably that, taking the population and taxation, the Scotch people were much more heavily taxed per head per annum than the English. In Scotland each person was taxed annually for Imperial purposes £2 5s. 8d., while in England the tax was only £2 2s. 3d., and in Ireland £1 11s. 3d. In a paper contributed to The Economist, a well-known and impartial magazine, a writer went into the relative proportions of the Spirit and Beer Duties of England and Scotland. The Economist pointed out in that article that the tax per head for beer and spirits in Scotland was £1 3s. 4d., while in England it was only 10s. 5d. Coming to the tax in the present Bill, it amounted to this: that while the English cask of beer—which contained 36 gallons, and, as far as he could ascertain, $3\frac{1}{2}$ gallons of proof spirit—was to pay 6s. 9d., $3\frac{1}{2}$ gallons of proof spirit in the form of whisky was to pay 38s. 6d. Why should that be? He would have liked to have asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer that question if he were present. How was it that he was not present? [At this point the Chancellor of the Exchequer entered the House.] It was to be remembered that it was the proof spirit in the beer that was taxed and not the beer itself, and as the cask of beer contained $3\frac{1}{2}$ gallons proof spirit it was obvious that Scotland was unfairly treated, because she was charged nearly six times as much. He had been accused of voting against his Party on this question; but he had to say that his vote was intended to go against injustice to Scotland without regard to Government or Party. His reason for standing up to-day was to protest against this injustice to Scotland. It was not because it was a tax upon whisky per se, but because he considered it a tax on a Scottish industry, and that Scotland was being unfairly treated as compared with the predominant partner. He objected to this state of things from three points of view—first, as a Scotch Nationalist; secondly, as a consumer—[laughter]—yes, as a consumer, but he could assure the Committee, a consumer of very moderate proportions; and thirdly, he objected as a medical, and, therefore, as a temperance man. And his objections did not take origin yesterday. He rose on the Second Reading of this Bill six or eight times to protest against this proposal, but was not fortunate enough to catch the Speaker's eye. Perhaps that was because he sat beyond the range of vision of the Chair. He sat far back because, not having a hankering after the Treasury Bench, he did not wish to add to the crush on the Benches below. They were not overcrowded to-day, but sometimes there was not elbow-room upon them. What hon. Members who were responsible for this crushing expected he did not know. They could not all expect office, though many of them might get knighthoods, and decorations of that sort. As a Scotch Nationalist, he protested against this duty because it was a disadvantage to Scotland. In consequence of climate, it was found that spirit suited the Scotch population better than beer. It was found that the water supply in Scotland was peculiarly suited to the distillation of whisky. It was found also that the character of the soil in many parts of Scotland was well suited to the cultivation of barley. For those and other reasons the distillation of whisky had become an industry in Scotland. Therefore, he considered that to tax an industry of this kind unfairly threatened to crush it. There was a point beyond which, if they taxed any industry, they would crush that industry. They had in the annals of Scotch history an illustration of this very fact. Before the time of the union of Scotland with England the beverage of the Scotch people, especially of the better class, was claret. Little or no whisky was distilled, but very soon after the Union the Englishman at once had his eye upon Scotland, and he insisted on taxing it heavily and imposing on the people, against their will, port, which would bear a higher duty. Hume, the historian, in a moment of irritation and sarcasm, had immortalised this historical fact in the following couplet:—

Dr. Macgregor

"Stern and erect the Caledonian stood,
Old was his mutton, and his claret good.
'Let him drink port,' the English statesman cried.
He drank the poison and his spirits died."

[Laughter.] In these dull times of exhaustive debate he took credit to himself that he was able to create a merry laugh occasionally in the House. His efforts, however, were sincere and earnest, though he did not mind a laugh. He meant what was said, his arguments being founded upon history and upon statistics. It was then that the Caledonian, in order to revive his spirits, took to the distillation of whisky. He appealed to the Temperance Party whether, in crushing the beverage of claret by over-taxation, they had not substituted a more injurious and powerful commodity in whisky — whether now, in seeking to over-tax whisky, they would not substitute, perhaps, worse forms of excess among the community? As a consumer — [laughter] — yes, he spoke here as a consumer, and repudiated the notion that he spoke for the producer. The brewers and distillers were able to take care of themselves, and it was no part of his duty or intention to take his stand in their favour. On the contrary, he stood up as a consumer to protest against the tax being put upon the consumer and not upon the producer. He was well aware that the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended that the tax should fall upon the producer, but everyone who knew the methods by which duty could be evaded by the producer would understand that the producer would not suffer by the increased impost. Who would suffer? Why the consumer would suffer from the tax. What would happen would be this: The distiller would launch upon the market raw and less mature spirit, and also spirit produced from inferior grain. Not only would he do this, but he would mix that spirit with inferior produce, probably foreign spirit — spirit distilled from potatoes, rice, diseased barley, and from sawdust, for all he knew. The result would be that, instead of recouping this 6d. per gallon, the consumer would probably suffer at least to double that extent. And it was not only the increased charge of which he complained, but the increased tax now proposed would simply lead to the drinking of an inferior whisky—a whisky that would produce a worse form of intoxication, disease, and destitution, of outrage and of crime. Therefore, he trusted the Temperance Party would not proceed to encourage the over-taxation of a wholesome product when properly, consistently, and moderately used, and not abused. He was well aware that many temperance men made martyrs of themselves for the sake of their fellow-men, who were less able than they were to exercise self-control. But if he might in a humble way, as a medical man—a man of the people, a man who had mixed with all classes of society to a great extent for over 30 years of professional life—if he might sound a note of warning to the Temperance Party, he would say this: "Beware that you do not defeat your own objects and aims by expecting too much, and by seeking legislation that will never pass in a free country like this." In seeking local veto and the proper control of the drink traffic he sympathised with the Temperance Party, but if they aimed at the abolition of the traffic entirely it would defeat their own objects. The peoples of every nation would always have a narcotic of some sort or other, whether it was alcohol in this country, opium in India and China, or the chewing of roots in certain savage countries, or the mastication of leaves in others. Was it not consistent with common sense that this traffic, if properly regulated, need not be injurious, but might be positively useful? From the point of view of the physician and the temperance man, he said that if they over-taxed alcohol, and drove the producer to adulterate, it would have a more injurious effect on the community and lead to more drunkenness and crime than that which obtained at present. Therefore, he called upon the Temperance Party to reconsider their position, and to go into the Lobby with him and vote against this increase of taxation, so far at least as Scotland was concerned. He would suggest that instead of increasing the Spirit Duty the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have increased the Death Duty, especially on the higher class of estates, or, if that was impossible, it would have been more popular and less oppressive on the masses if he had put another 1d. on the Income Tax.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member that he was out of Order in speaking beyond the Amendment.

DR. MACGREGOR would not go further into the matter. He hoped every friend of Scotland and every lover of justice and fair play would go into the Lobby with him. He apologised to the House for his disconnected and incoherent speech. Unfortunately, he had caught a chill in the Lobby last night, and was not in his best form to-day.

Amendment proposed, in page 16, line 5, to leave out the words "Great Britain," and insert the word "English."
—(Dr. Macgregor.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I would condole with my hon. Friend on the chill he caught in the Lobby, but my hon. Friend is in form enough to menace my Budget in his very amusing and able speech. My hon. Friend has evidently not indulged in the poison to which he has referred, because nobody can say that his spirits have died under the effect of that poison. The full amount of duty, as I have explained before, will be really $\frac{3}{4}$ d. a bottle; therefore, if whisky is charged 1d. a bottle extra it will be sufficient to cover the duty. In the situation in which the country now finds itself I do not think that 1d. a bottle is an inordinate tax upon the consumer.

DR. MACGREGOR: It is the last straw that breaks the camel's back.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not think that 1d. a bottle on spirits will break the back of the Scotch camel. If the 1d. is divided into as many parts as a bottle is divided into glasses you will get at what the ordinary consumer will have to pay. The Committee will not think the tax is an inordinate contribution to the £4,000,000 required for the Navy. A claim is made for justice to Scotland, but it would involve injustice to the English consumer. I should like to point out the inconvenience that would arise from the adoption of the Amendment. If we put an extra duty upon English whisky and not upon Scotch whisky it would be a very serious inconvenience to gentlemen crossing the border, because if my hon. Friend were coming here to fulfil his Parliamentary duties he would have to be carefully examined at Berwick-on-Tweed to see whether he was endeavouring to evade the tax. The establishment of Customs along the line of the old Roman wall would not be very convenient to the inhabitants of the two countries. My hon. Friend's arguments are in favour of the Scotch people, and he intends to leave things as they are in England. No doubt there is very good reason why the Scotch people prefer whisky. What is said about the high quality of the water in Scotland is a fact of which I have had a pleasant experience in former days. I remember many years ago being upon Loch Katrine with the late Lord John Russell. We had a very intelligent boatman—the boatmen are all intelligent in Scotland. We saw the great works which supply Glasgow with water, and I said to the boatman, "I did not know that they drank so much water in Glasgow." The boatman replied, "Oh, Sir, don't you know that it makes the best toddy in the world?" That bears out the view of my hon. Friend. The Committee will not expect me to go more fully into the questions raised. It will recognise that the same treatment must be meted out to both countries; and, therefore, I hope that the proposal for a differential duty will not be pressed.

Dr. Macgregor

DR. MACGREGOR inquired how the right hon. Gentleman justified the imposition of a tax of 6s. 9d. upon the same quantity of spirit in England compared with 3s. 6d. on the same quantity in Scotland?

[No reply was given.]

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll) said, that he represented a county in which probably the largest amount of whisky was made of any county in the world, and he desired to call attention to the remarkable fact that, although the Finance Bill had been before the House for a very considerable time, he had not received from a single constituent a remonstrance against the increased duties. He had not received a single communication from any brewer or distiller in Argyllshire. This showed that the people in that part of the world acquiesced in the necessity for the imposition of the extra duties. In times long gone by it was considered unjust to ask people to make bricks with straw, but nowadays Chancellors of the Exchequer were asked to make ironclads without money. The House had rightly pressed upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer the necessity for more ironclads, and, of course, the right hon. Gentleman must be supplied with the money. but everybody was in favour of the expenditure being defrayed by somebody else. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had occupied most of the time, whilst the Bill had been in Committee, in trying to exempt the landed classes from its operation. Amendments of every description had been moved—some more foolish than others, which was all he could say about them. He had learnt this lesson from listening to all these speeches: that he would never again place any limit to human folly and selfishness. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer, he had noticed, had never denounced the principle of the Bill, because he hoped to be Chancellor of the Exchequer again; and whenever he rose on the Opposition side of the Table the ghost of Banquo rose at the other side and shook his gory head at him. The right hon. Gentleman had nothing to say against the Bill, but he (Sir D. Macfarlane) would not go into that matter. All he wished to point out was that from the greatest distilling county in the United Kingdom he had received no remonstrances against the measure.

*MR. J. WILSON (Lanark, Govan) said, he had listened with great attention to the hon. Member (Dr. Macgregor), and was surprised that he had expressed expectation that he would be followed into the Lobby by the Temperance Party belonging to Scotland. He had had some means of ascertaining the views of the people of Scotland as to this Bill, and he could bear out the testimony given by the hon. Member for Argyllshire on the subject. He had heard no one find fault with the additional duty upon spirits; rather the reverse. Even the trade themselves would have preferred the Chancellor of the Exchequer putting on 1s. instead of 6d., because in that case they would have had some reason to raise the price of the gill. It had been stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that 1d. upon the 2s. or 3s. paid for a bottle of spirits was not a large sum to contribute towards the expenditure necessary to meet the demand for an increased Navy. But he would point out that in Scotland little whisky was bought in bottles. It was mostly sold in gills, and the new tax was not 1d. upon a gill. He hoped the hon. Member for Inverness would not expect me to follow him into the Lobby or the opposite Lobby to partake of a gill in order to set up his constitution. He had expected his hon. Friend, like most medical men who were to the front, would have shown the mischief that was done by drinking, even moderately, alcoholic liquor. It was well-known that now most medical men had given up the use of alcoholic drink as medicine, and mostly discountenanced the use of it. He hoped that the decision of the Committee would be such as to encourage the Chancellor of the Exchequer to stand firm with regard to his Budget.

*MR. BIRKMYRE (Ayr, &c.) said, that after the remarks of the hon. Member for Argyllshire it was his duty to say that he represented upwards of 22 distillers at Campbeltown, who had asked him to use his influence to further their views in this matter, and to vote against this imposition. They had desired an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but the right hon. Gentleman, owing to his multitudinous duties probably, had not been able to receive a deputation. He himself intended to vote against the Amendment, and he had endeavoured to reconcile his constituents to the change proposed by reminding them that when the Conservative Government were in Office they imposed the same duty, 6d. per gallon, with the distinct pledge that the impost was to be dedicated or ear-marked as a special fund for compensating and endowing the liquor trade. The Conservative Government, however, never saw their way to ratifying the promise then made to the trade. He had indicated, further, to his distiller friends that whatever conditions the Liberal Government made in this matter they certainly would not follow the example of the Conservative Government and break their pledges.

*MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said, he had an interest like his hon. Friend the Member for Argyllshire in this matter, and must speak on behalf of Ross-shire, where the finest whisky was produced. He had had applications from distillers asking him to vote against the Government, but that he would not do. He was sorry for the Member for Inverness-shire, with whom he sympathised very much, but thought he had gone too far. If he confined his Amendment to the Highlands, where good whisky was made, he could understand him, but why should the Lowlands be exempted, where they only made vile raw whisky. He had heard lately of whisky being made not only from potatoes, but from sawdust, though he would not say that was done in the Lowlands. It could not be denied that people would be much better without such vile stuff mis-called whisky. He hoped his hon. Friend would not be so insane as to go into the Lobby with the brewers. He should not vote to bring back to power the enemies of the Highland people. They had had six years of Tory rule, and he should not be a party to giving them six years more of it.

*DR. MACGREGOR explained that what he had condemned was the abuse of whisky and not its use as a wholesome article of diet. If this industry were crushed, something far worse than whisky might be substituted—some cheap, injurious drink which might have far worse consequences (several of which he could name) morally and bodily, physically and mentally.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) assured the hon. Member below the Gangway that he need be under no apprehension whatever as to putting the Government in a minority, as the Opposition had no intention of supporting an Amendment which separated the two countries in this matter. If any Scotchman wanted to demonstrate his feeling against the Government in regard to the increased duty he could do so with the most absolute safety.

Question put, and agreed to.

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) moved an Amendment to exempt from the duty spirits taken out of bond for bonâ fide medical purposes. He said that chemists objected very much to this extra duty of 6d. per gallon. It was too small to be recovered from the purchasing public on each article sold, and practically they would themselves be the losers in a business which certainly ought not to be discouraged. A short time ago a question on the subject was put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who referred, in reply to a speech made a year or two ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, in which he dealt with the matter. He could not accept the objection that it would be difficult to make a distinction, and that it would be practically impossible to carry it out; because other proposals, said at one time to be impossible, as, for instance, making allowances upon property under Schedule A, had been carried out.

Amendment proposed, in page 16, line 14, after the word "spirits," to insert the words "except spirits taken out of bond for bonâ fide medical purposes."—(Mr. A. C. Morton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT objected to any proposal to exempt chemists and druggists from payment of the duty on spirits. To do so would be to permit an extensive trade possibly to be carried on in the sale of spirits by the mere admixture of a few drops of some preparation which would come within the words "for medical purposes." He could not accept the Amendment.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk) suggested that the hon. Member should withdraw this Amendment, in order to allow a Division to be taken upon the next on the Paper, in the name of the hon. Member for York, upon which the subject could be better discussed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GRANT LAWSON, for Mr. BUTCHER (York), moved to insert at the end of the clause the following:—

He said that, while some of them had not received complaints from distillers or others, there were very few Members of that House who had not received complaints from the chemists in their constituencies as to the hardship of this clause in regard to medicine. The quantities in which drugs were sold were so small that it would be impossible for chemists to charge the amount upon the articles sold to customers. This proposal would operate as a direct tax, therefore, upon medical dispensers. Medical preparations of this description were often used as antidotes for the abuse of spirits, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having already got his extra in the other direction, ought not to refuse this exemption from an increased duty, which in this case meant direct increased taxation.

Amendment proposed, in page 16, line 18, at end, insert—

"Provided that, on all spirits used in the preparation or making up of medicines or drugs for medical purposes, a drawback of sixpence per gallon shall be allowed."—(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, it was impossible for him to agree to the proposal, as it would possibly be made use of in such a way as to cut down the receipts of the Revenue far too much. How would it be possible for the Revenue officials to ascertain whether the spirits upon which the drawback was allowed were really employed in the preparation of drugs to be used solely for medical purposes? Opinions differed also as to the meaning of the words "medical purposes." The hon. Member for Ayrshire said that whisky was used for medical purposes. Was whisky to be considered, therefore, a medical drug? Hon. Members opposite could, of course, go on pressing any number of Amendments of this kind upon the Government, but they seemed entirely to have forgotten that if such Amendments were carried they would impose upon the Revenue authorities new duties which they would be quite unable to perform.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, that apparently the Chancellor of the Exchequer opposed the Amendment because the drawback asked for would cause such an enormous loss to the Revenue. If that were the real ground for his objecting to the Amendment, it seemed to him to show how enormously unjust the burden must be that was intended to be placed upon one class of traders. It was proposed that the drawback should be allowed on each gallon of spirits used in the preparation of medical drugs, and not, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer would seem to imply, upon each gallon of drugs in the manufacture of which spirits had been employed.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the Revenue would be defrauded.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, that would not be the case, for, after all, but a small quantity of spirits would be so used. He considered the question of such importance that he hoped the Committee would divide upon the Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, there were certainly some hon. Members of the Committee on the hon. Gentleman's side of the House who did not consider the Amendment involved a question of great importance, and that he must, at all events, acknowledge that he had failed to convince the right hon. Member for St. George's, Hanover Square. It was idle to take a Division upon a question such as that raised in the Amendment they were considering. If it were agreed to, where would its provisions stop? If a man wished to obtain the drawback on a certain quality of spirits, all he would have to do, he supposed, would be to add a little extract of nutmeg or some such harmless ingredients, and then he could claim that the spirit had been employed in the manufacture of a medical drug. He considered that the wish of the hon. Gentleman to press the matter to a Division was most unjustifiable, and amounted to nothing less than an attempt by hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House to break down the Revenue.

*MR. TOWNSEND (Bristol, N.) said, that having had experience for 40 years in the wholesale and retail drug trade, he was perfectly certain that those who were most competent to represent the interests of the trade did not desire to see the Amendment passed. The Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain would certainly have raised a strong protest against the clause had they not considered that the difficulties in the way of claiming an exemption from the tax would be altogether insuperable. If such an exemption were to be claimed it would involve the constant attendance of Revenue Inspectors at every drug manufactory throughout the Kingdom. However desirable a change in the direction indicated by the Amendment might be, he did not see at present how it could be practically carried out.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said that, while he entirely agreed with the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the increased difficulties that would be raised in the way of collecting the Revenue and the opportunity that would be given for fraud if the Amendment before the Committee were accepted, he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman's remarks that the Amendment had been placed upon the Paper with any desire to break down the Revenue. He himself had received assurances, not so much from the large traders, but from very many of the smaller manufacturers, that they wished the question with regard to articles used for medical purposes to be very carefully considered, in the hope that some relief would be allowed from the present heavy taxation they were subjected to. He did not think it would be desirable for the Committee to divide upon an Amendment which, if agreed to, would not remove the grievance it was intended to meet.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 25.

*MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury) moved an Amendment providing that additional Excise Duty of 6d. per barrel should only apply to beer "brewed from substitutes for barley-malt and hops." He said, that his object in doing so was to protect, as far as possible, the interests of the agricultural classes against the operation of this clause imposing an additional duty of 6d. a barrel on all beer brewed in the United Kingdom, and to throw the proposed burden of taxation upon the shoulders of those better able than they were to bear it. Many persons justly regarded pure beer absolutely as a form of nutrition, and every encouragement to the brewing of beer from English hops and malt should be given by the Government. The question of the supply of pure beer to the people of this country was so important that he intended to press his Amendment to a Division. When the question of legislation in this direction was brought before the House it was too often treated by hon. Members as a matter of merriment; but he did not consider it a subject for levity at all; it was rather one of "specific gravity." This proposal for securing pure beer had received the support of very large numbers of his fellow-countrymen. Whenever there had been the slightest chance of legislation on the subject Petitions in support of it had been extensively signed by all classes of the community—by Bishops, Magistrates, farmers, and labourers alike, and he did not believe there was any other subject in the world on which such unanimity of feeling had been shown. He remembered seeing on one occasion in particular Sir E. Birkbeck, who was no longer a Member of this House, hardly able to stagger to the Table under the weight of a Petition with 30,000 signatures in favour of the Bill. Although he was not speaking at that moment in support of the Pure Beer Bill, it was evident that the Amendment he had placed on the Paper tended in the direction aimed at by the Bill, which had the support of almost every Chamber of Agriculture. The Central Chamber of Agriculture had on several occasions unanimously recommended it to the consideration and sympathy of the House, and, still more recently, a large Organisation, which he was glad to see spreading its roots far and wide—as some hon. Members would find to their cost at the next General Election—he referred to the National Agricultural Union—had included this question in its programme, and had discovered that it was one of the most popular of their proposals. In appealing to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he felt that he was appealing to sympathetic ears. He well remembered with gratitude the prompt manner in which the right hon. Gentleman in 1886, at the request of some of them, took off the cottagers' brewing licence, and the right hon. Gentleman's short tenure of Office on that occasion would be memorable by reason of the fact that that was the only time on which they had reached the Second Reading of the Pure Beer Bill. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would give his support to this Amendment as being one which would commend itself to millions of his fellow-countrymen. There were upwards of 32,000,000 barrels of beer brewed every year—nearly a barrel for every man, woman, and child in the United Kingdom. Out of this number a very large proportion were brewed with substitutes for barley-malt and hops. The Amendment he previously placed on the Paper—and which proved to be out of Order—was designed to help the Chancellor of the Exchequer to increase his Revenue. It was applied to the same clause and same line, and read thus—

"For every 36 gallons of worts of a specific gravity of 1,055 degrees, containing ingredients other than barley-malt and hops, the duty of 1s. and so on in proportion for any difference in quantity or gravity."

The effect of this Amendment would have been to give the right hon. Gentleman a sum of £400,000 more, and that would have rejoiced his heart as well as that of every well-wisher of the agricultural interest. But as the Amendment did not conform to the Rules of the House, he had to amend it and put it in the form in which it was now submitted to the Committee. He thought he would be able to show that even if this Amendment were accepted the Revenue would not suffer to any material extent. By the kindness of the officials at Somerset House he had been able to check the figures placed at his disposal. So far as he was able to judge, his proposal would have the effect of reducing the amount payable to the Exchequer by a sum of £250,000. How was that to be made up? His suggestion was that it could be made up by a licence to the users of substitutes for barley-malt and hops—on the same lines as the licences formerly given to those who used sugar—the licence to increase in proportion with the number of barrels brewed.

SIR W. HARCOURT: In fact, a graduated duty.

MR. QUILTER: That was so. The hon. Member for Wimbledon was a great authority on this subject, and must be regarded as the spokesman of a powerful section of the brewing interest. On the Second Reading of the Finance Bill the hon. Member said—

"If the Chancellor of the Exchequer was going to insist on running up the taxation on beer to such a point that it could not be made from malt and hops, the brewer, like any other manufacturer, would naturally seek other ingredients."

That was direct evidence of the source from which rich incomes were made. It would be seen from the figures he had to quote that there was some truth in the hon. Member's prophecy. And he would like to say, in passing, that this country appeared to be drifting into somewhat the same condition as obtained in our Australian Colonies, for in Victoria 13,500,000 gallons of beer were brewed from sugar and other materials as against 516,000 gallons from malt and hops. That was precisely what we were coming to in this country. The quantity of beer made from sugar and not from barley-malt and hops was rapidly growing, and he believed that the Inland Revenue was alarmed at the amount of licence which was now superseding the liberty which the right hon. Member for Midlothian meant to give when he assented to the repeal of the Malt Tax. He looked at this matter in the light of actual official Returns, and he proposed to lay before the House half-a-dozen figures in support of the case he had to submit. How were they to distinguish between brewers who used substitutes and those who only used barley and hops? That could, he submitted, easily be done by a slight alteration of the forms issued by Somerset House for use by brewers by amplifying one head "definitions" and providing an extra column in which other materials used should be entered. The Somerset House authorities would then be able to distinguish between those brewers who used substitutes and those who used the genuine article. He was one of those who thought that the repeal of the Malt Tax was one of the greatest mistakes made in the interests of agriculture. He went even further, for he would heartily support the re-imposition of that tax, believing that it would get rid of many of the difficulties which this Amendment sought to deal with. It was impossible to deal with this question without troubling the Committee with figures, and he was compelled to give statistics as to the number of brewers and maltsters before and after the repeal of the Malt Tax. He had taken three separate periods of 20 years. He found that in 1853 the number of brewers was 45,294; in 1873, 29,969; and in 1893, 10,143. In 1853 the maltsters numbered 7,805; in 1873 the number had diminished to 4,977; and in 1880 it had dwindled to 3,835. The figures were obtained from—(1) First Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 1857, Appendices 28 a, b, c, pp. LXI-V.; (2) Twenty-eighth Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 1885, Appendix page 164; and (3) Return Brewers' Licences March 12, 1894, No. 11, page 8. Several remarks were made in the course of the previous day's Debate as to the use of sugar in brewing. As far as he could gather from the official Returns, the use of sugar in brewing was not absolutely necessary. For example, two of the largest brewers, who brewed between them 3,000,000 barrels a year, used practically none. In the year ended 30th September, 1893, the number of common brewers was 10,143, and the quantity brewed was, roundly, 32,000,000 barrels. An analysis giving the proportions of malt and sugar came out as follows :—

Brewers.	Barrels brewed.	Bushels of malt used per cwt. of sugar.
2	3,000,000	350
8,307	2,000,000	94
1,834	27,000,000	22½
10,143	32,000,000	Average 26

In the Return for the year ending September, 1892, one brewer was shown to have used as little as six bushels of malt per hundredweight of sugar, and there were, doubtless, many more who used similar small quantities, although the Returns did not disclose the fact. And in that connection he wished to compliment the Sister Island on the very satisfactory state of the brewing interest there as far as regarded the comparative use of sugar in brewing. He believed the action of the brewers on the other side of the Irish Channel in this respect had largely conduced to their prosperity, as was especially noticeable in the case of one or two firms. He hoped he would have the support of the Irish Members on this Amendment. It would be of interest to hon. Members to know the total amount of sugar used in brewing. The figures were :—

Years.	lbs.
1856	1,790,529	(Return No. 136, March 1, 1880; Sugar used in brewing.)
1893	237,772,218	(Return No. 11, March 12, 1894; Brewers' Licences, page 7.)

The Amendment did not aim at preventing the moderate use of sugar for priming beer; but he contended that the additional duty proposed by the Government should be imposed upon beer actually brewed from substitutes for barley-malt and hops. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he believed a small percentage of sugar, not exceeding perhaps 2 per cent., might be safely and wisely used in priming beer, as was the custom of some who actually brewed from nothing but malt and hops. He desired, too, to make it quite clear that he did not seek to tax the use of bisulphite of lime as a preservative. Many Members of that House must have travelled between Stuttgardt and Munich on the hot red velvet cushions in the burning heat of the summer, and they would all be able to recall the delight they experienced at the sight of a tray with those slender glasses full of a delicious, foaming, deep-coloured beverage, the pleasure of drinking which was unalloyed afterwards by the slightest headache or mischief. Even Members who never partook of beer in their own country must have succumbed, under stress of circumstances, to this temptation. He was himself led to ask how this drink, which was so delicious and harmless, was made, and he found that under the laws of Bavaria every person who brewed was compelled to brew exclusively from malt and hops; and not only was the man who brewed from other ingredients liable to be fined and imprisoned, but the vendor also ran the same risk. It was hard to contemplate the idea of the hon. Members for Cheltenham or Bedford spending the summer in one of Her Majesty's suburban retreats because the articles which they dealt out to Her Majesty's subjects had been impregnated or adulterated with other materials than barley-malt and hops. Even he did not propose such strong and stringent legislation, neither did he think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would venture to suggest it; but he did believe that if they adopted the course he had suggested, it would be fraught with benefit to very large numbers of the people of this country. There was the question of Protection—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The question of Protection is hardly germane to the subject under consideration.

MR. QUILTER said, he thought that the Chairman misunderstood his meaning. The protection to which he referred was protection for the stomach and health. [Laughter and cheers.] But he would not further press that point. All he would say was, that was what he had in view when he put his Amendment upon the Paper. The Amendment ought to have the support of Members who were connected with the temperance movement. Real temperance was the moderate use of those drinks which Providence and skill—[Laughter]—provided us with, and such temperance was vital to the health and well-being of the community. He therefore looked for support to the hon. Members for Cocker mouth and South Tyrone, although he could not answer for the hon. Baronet, whose idea of temperance seemed to differ from that of anybody else. If the effect of his Amendment should be to obtain for the public a purer article, a decided step in the direction of temperance would be made, and therefore he hoped that the Temperance Party in that House would vote with him on that occasion. It was the experience of farmers, especially of those in the Eastern counties, that the conduct of labourers in the harvest-field who drank home-brewed beer contrasted favourably with the conduct of men who were supplied with beer from the public-house. He was thankful to say there were hundreds of thousands of these men who did their work steadily with a view to earning money, whereas those who got their beer from the public-house were noisy, troublesome, and intemperate. Over and over again had he heard farmers say that they would not send their men with drays to such or such a place, and when asked for an explanation they replied, "We do not trust our men away from home, where they can drink home-brewed beer. If they are sent to a place where they can get one sort of stuff at one public-house, and another sort at another public-house, our horses are likely to return home without the men." A farmer had told him recently that when beer was procured from the public-house it affected the legs of his men so seriously that they seemed to want wooden legs, meaning thereby that they were not able to stand up in the hayfield. If the Amendment brought about a better state of things they would surely not regret it. It was impossible on an Amendment like this in Committee to adequately deal even with one part of this large subject, for brewing was a great mystery. Though he had worshipped at a distance for many years, he had never yet been able to penetrate beyond its portals. He appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to raise the money he required from those who made large profits out of the adulteration of the national beverage, and not from those who, while they provided healthful and invigorating drink for the people, were also reviving and benefiting a national industry, the decadence of which they so much deplored.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said, that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not been for the moment absent from the House, he should have been prepared to congratulate him sincerely and honestly on having had placed before him an Amendment which he would joyfully accept, and which would be likely to carry out some of the main objects which he had so often assured the House he had at heart. Some Members of the House might be pardoned if they did not absolutely agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the Budget contained all the cardinal virtues rolled into one. The right hon. Gentleman had, at all events, asserted that it contained certain elements which would command general approval, that it would be a burden on the rich but not on the poor, and that it would not impose any impost upon those who were not in a position to meet it. The right hon. Gentleman had also asserted that his Budget was so framed and arranged that it would not injure any British industry, and that even if it should for a moment tread on the little toe of any British industry, it would not touch the industry of agriculture, of which the right hon. Gentleman professed to be not an enemy, but a champion. Then the right hon. Gentleman asserted that his proposals would not affect the bulk of the working classes in any way. The Opposition had challenged the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman, and had asserted that his Budget was not composed of these various virtues, and would not carry out these objects. There was now offered for the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman an Amendment which was in exact harmony with his professions. It would most distinctly and positively retain the burden upon the rich, and it would differentiate between two classes of wealthy brewers—those who supplied the public with an article which was not genuine, and those who gave the public an unadulterated and pure article. The Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to view the Amendment most favourably, because it would not remove the burden from the class of brewers as a whole; it would only remove it on to those shoulders which certainly ought to be called upon to bear the heaviest burden, and would relieve the shoulders of those who carried on their trade according to a method of which everyone approved. It had been said that certain of the leading firms of brewers would benefit by the acceptance of the Amendment. If, however, any firm laid itself out to sell a more absolutely pure article than other firms supplied, it ought to be the object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to protect that firm, or, at all events, to see that it did not suffer from the fact that it was doing all it could in the interests of the community at large. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said also that his Budget would not injure British industries, more especially the agricultural industry. Well, the Amendment sought to remove any injury which might fall upon British industries under the right hon. Gentleman's proposal, and especially any injury that might fall upon agriculture. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had further urged that his proposals would not affect the community at large, and, here again, the Amendment would operate in the direction desired by the right hon. Gentleman. A far larger number of persons than perhaps the right hon. Gentleman was aware were watching the progress of the Amendment with very great interest, and with a strong desire for its adoption. The reason was not far to seek. Of course, he would allow that the Amendment raised the question of what was called pure beer. He (Colonel Kenyon-Slaney), like his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Quilter), had been for several years endeavouring to introduce a Bill on the subject, but the chances of the ballot had not enabled him to do so. He felt, however, that he had some little right to speak in favour of an Amendment which was in the direction of that Bill. If the Amendment were adopted it would remove a most distinct injury and injustice which at present pressed on those who sought for its removal. The consumer and the nation at large had a right to have a genuine article supplied to them. That principle had been acknowledged in the Merchandise Marks Act, in the legislation enacted for preventing the passing off of margarine as butter, and in the efforts that were being made to prevent people selling foreign as English meat—efforts which had been largely assisted by that most sensible Report which had been issued by the other House, which seemed to him to be generally the place where sensible legislation was initiated, and which certainly in this case had done more to help agriculture than anything that had emanated from the House of Commons as at present constituted. He supposed that 99 out of every 100 persons in this country who asked for a glass of beer expected that it would be what it pretended to be—a concoction of barley-malt and hops. There were, however, three sorts of beer that could be bought—namely, (1) pure beer; (2) beer which, though harmless, was not brewed purely from barley-malt and hops; and (3) beer that was absolutely noxious and poisonous. The last-named beer was issued only by the lowest class of public-houses, and was not sold by the higher class breweries. If by adopting this Amendment the Committee could drive it out of existence they would certainly be conferring a very immediate and direct benefit upon the masses of the community, who were driven by force of circumstances to obtain liquor more or less from these tainted sources. He would ask what were the experiences of any hon. Member who had been called upon to act as a Magistrate in a rural district? Such an hon. Member knew perfectly well that a great number of cases of drunkenness were due not to what was termed “boozing,” but to the drinking of a moderate amount of beer of an impure and noxious character. The very first effect of this Amendment would be to knock on the head and drive out of the market the supply of this noxious and impure liquor. Possibly he might be told that existing legislation was sufficient to produce this result. He was afraid, however, that the Adulteration Acts were not sufficiently strong to cope with this particular evil. It was very difficult to detect the bad elements in beer after fermentation had taken place, and it required a long and weary process to secure a conviction. As to beer which was not pure but still harmless, the Amendment would not, he believed, in any way interfere with the free sale of such liquor as Pilsener beer and

Colonel Kenyon-Slaney

Lager beer, which, although they might not be absolutely pure according to British notions of purity, were harmless and undoubtedly popular, and ought not to be subjected to any unfair impost. He came now to the pure beer, which he and those who thought with him did seek to bring into larger consumption throughout the country. They did not ask for any exceptional favour in regard to pure beer brewed from barley-malt and hops, but that it should be treated very much in the same way as butter was treated under the Margarine Acts and as foreign cutlery was treated under the Merchandise Marks Act. They asked that the consumer should have a right to know that when he asked for a pure article he was not getting an impure one. If this were a class Amendment brought forward with the object of relieving from taxation those who ought to be taxed, and therefore making the necessity of taxation in other directions larger, it would possibly be open to some sort of criticism. This Amendment was, to a large extent, demanded by the farming interest and the producers of barley, as well as by the consumers of beer. He could, from his own knowledge, support the assertion of the hon. Member who introduced the Amendment, to the effect that the greatest interest was felt in the question by both the classes mentioned throughout the rural districts of the country. He was not sure that he knew of any subject of possible legislation on which the attention of farmers was more concentrated at this moment than that which was aimed at in the Amendment and which was generally known under the name of "pure beer." If they came to consider what an important part of farm production barley was, and how around the price of barley ranged the question of profit and loss on many farms in the country, they could not wonder that farmers were vitally interested in an Amendment which they thought would have the result of maintaining the price of that commodity. The Amendment did not seek to impose a prohibitive or protective duty on foreign barley. That might or might not be a wise thing to do, but, at any rate, it was not cognate to the present proposal. The Amendment simply sought to apply the same lines of legislation to beer as were applied to other articles of general consumption; and surely that was not an unfair thing to do. An hon. Member opposite had said that he grudged any assistance to the agricultural community. But he (Colonel Kenyon-Slaney) took it that the hon. Member was almost alone in that opinion. Certainly if the Amendment were to have the effect he described it would not be grudged by the majority of Members on the Ministerial side, and he did not think that it would be grudged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He hoped the Amendment would not be prejudiced by the consideration that its adoption by the Chancellor of the Exchequer would help those who were struggling to carry on an industry on which so much of the welfare of the country depended. Incidentally, he would point out that all encouragement given to the cultivation of barley had a direct effect on the wages of the people employed on the land. The demand for the Amendment, therefore, came in a large degree from the barley growers, and there seemed to him to be a very fair prima facie case for its acceptance. For one farmer, however, 50 or 100 working men had expressed to him their desire that the Amendment should be adopted, and for one producer of barley 100 consumers were interested in the subject. The best class of agricultural labourers, the very men they wished to maintain on the land, were injured by impure and noxious beer. Some people might say, "Ah! You agricultural labourers don't know what is good for you." No doubt the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth would like to treat them, as he treated so many other classes in the community, as if they were babies in swaddling clothes to which he had the sole right of acting as nurse or pupil teacher. But the agricultural labourers knew what was good for them a great deal better than the hon. Baronet, and if they preferred pure beer they ought not to be prohibited from getting it by the refusal of this moderate Amendment. He had tried to prove that the first effect of the Amendment would be to deal fairly and properly with the different classes of beer produced; and, secondly, that the demand for the Amendment came from those who had the best right to make it—namely, from the producers and consumers. Hon. Members might think that the change in the law proposed would be an innovation; but he wondered if they had thought at all upon what had been the course of legislation on the subject in past years. He believed he was correct in saying that in 1802 a penalty was imposed for brewing from anything but malt and hops, the reason being that the use of other substances was injurious to health and to the Revenue receipts. In 1811 burnt sugar and water were allowed to be added; in 1816 a wave of common sense came over the country, and this extension was revoked; in 1847 sugar was again allowed; in 1862 substitutes for hops were allowed; and in 1880 any material was allowed which could be called saccharine and which was not injurious to health. The tendency, therefore, had been to give more and more liberty to the brewers as to the use of substitutes. Inch by inch Parliament had been driven from the position it had taken up in 1802. The Amendment did not seek to prevent brewers from using other substances than malt and hops, but only to give preferential treatment to genuine beer. The effect of the Amendment would be felt only by the compounders of noxious rubbish and by the vendors of substitutes. He maintained that the Amendment would not injure the legitimate traders or the Revenue. On the other hand, the agricultural interest generally would benefit considerably. It might be urged that such a provision would throw all the trade into the hands of the large brewers who brewed pure beer and would kill out the smaller brewers who could not afford to be so scrupulous. He was opposed to monopolies in brewing, and he would rather see the brewing trade conducted by a large number of small brewers than a small number of large brewers. But if the former alternative meant adulterated and impure beer he did not see how it could be advocated by social or temperance reformers. If the result of passing the Amendment should be to throw the trade more into the hands of those who issued the purest article, sympathy with the small traders would not prevent some hon. Gentlemen opposite from going into the Lobby in support of the Amendment. To all who sympathised with the agricultural interest he appealed with a considerable degree of confidence. He desired to echo the appeal made by the Mover of the Amendment to the Temperance Party, and he thought he might appeal to the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth, who was perhaps the most difficult representative of that section. He challenged the hon. Baronet to say whether an appeal to statistics would not make it perfectly clear that a great deal more death and disease was the result of bad water rather than the use of good beer. If he wanted to prove his case by a witness, he should ask the hon. Baronet, "if the effect of what a man drinks is to be seen in what he says and does, how is it possible that you can stand up and advocate the use of water, and water only, when a speech such as you delivered at Leeds the other day was the result of the continued use or abuse of water." The only possible excuse on which they could forgive the tone of such a speech was that the hon. Baronet had been indulging too freely in the use of water contaminated at its source. In conclusion, he would repeat that a good case had been made out for the Amendment; and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer should prove a little deaf to his arguments, he would urge those who sat behind the right hon. Gentleman to draw away from his lead and follow the supporters of the Amendment into the Lobby.

SIR W. HARCOURT: There have been many rather remarkable arguments used in the course of this Debate. The hon. Member for Sudbury informed us that the manufacture of pure beer from particular materials was part of the Providential arrangements of the universe aided by the skill of man. That view of Providential arrangements reminds me of what I remember Lord Beaconsfield said of a well-known and popular work by Sir Archibald Alison, which he described in one of his novels, I think Coningsby, as "A work by Mr. Worth in 15 volumes, intended to prove that Providence on the whole was on the side of the Tories."

The hon. Member has attempted to prove that Providence on the whole is in favour of beer manufactured exclusively from malt and hops. One thing which has struck me as rather remarkable is that the hon. Member for Sudbury and the hon. and gallant Member who has just sat down have not been successful before on this subject. They had for six years a Government of their own and a Pure Beer Bill. They had a Chancellor of the Exchequer who put an additional duty on beer, and they had a Minister of Agriculture to help them. Why did they not carry out this doctrine of pure beer? These proposed arrangements were not made when the late Chancellor of the Exchequer put his extra duty upon beer, and this Providential doctrine had not an operative effect upon the late Minister of Agriculture. Why did he not give facilities for pure beer? It is a remarkable fact that only now, under the new Budget proposals, do gentlemen opposite become so alive to the nature of the manufacture of beer. It would be interesting to know why the late Chancellor of the Exchequer did not accept that which the hon. and gallant Gentleman thinks I ought to jump at. There is another rather remarkable thing about the matter. Last night we were discussing the brewers. They were presented to us, and they presented themselves, as a sort of angels without wings. They used no materials except malt and hops—not they! But there was one gentleman who blushing confessed that he used a little sugar, but, like the baby, it was very little, and it was of the very best quality. That was the hon. Member for Wimbledon. Then the Member for Mid-Armagh, the accredited representative of the firm of Guinness, said, “We never use anything for beer but malt and hops.” The hon. Member for Sudbury is not merely a worthy Representative of an agricultural county, but a most influential member of the firm of Allsopp.

MR. QUILTER: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but I am not a member of the firm of Allsopp.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Oh, he has not an interest!

MR. QUILTER: I am not sure that is a fair question—I certainly have an interest.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Member acknowledges an interest in the business of Allsopp. A few months ago I might not have envied him; to-day I do. I will point out that these gentlemen will be exactly served by this Amendment, because they, being the manufacturers of the high-priced beers, who do not use, as we all know, any commodities but malt and hops, will, by the help of this Amendment, be able to squeeze out all their competitors who do as a fact use sugar and other things. Therefore, I have not the smallest doubt that the most ardent supporter of a Motion of this kind is the Member for Mid-Armagh, whose Aaron's rod of Guinness would swallow up all the other serpents at once. Under such circumstances, I am not sure that the hon. Member for Wimbledon would not be ready to sacrifice the “very best sugar” to a moderate amount. All the competitors of these great breweries will disappear. Who are the people who brew this wretched beer? Of course, the smaller brewers, who sell beer at a more moderate rate. We heard nothing last night of those brewers who brew what the Member for Sudbury described as such beer that after the agricultural labourers had drunk it they appeared as if they had wooden legs, and could not stand up in the hayfield. That is the description of the British brewers—not such brewers as the Member for Bristol referred to, for he told us his was not a paying concern.

MR. W. LONG: I am not the Member for Bristol. [Cries of “West Derby!” and “Liverpool!”]

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg pardon; he is the agricultural Member for some great town. Well, there are these sinful brewers all over the country who are brewing beer which prevents people from standing on their legs in the hayfield. What is it they use? They use sugar. They are not to use sugar any more, not even “sugar of the very best quality;” and they are not to use grain of any kind except barley. I observe that the hon. Member is moderate with his demand, for he does not say that it shall be British barley. Russian barley is one of the cheapest grains that can be bought, and therefore brewers may use as much Russian barley as they like; and we are assured on the authority of the hon. Member for Wimbledon that at the Institution of Brewers, where those who were learned in the science of brewing met to discuss all the subjects connected with the industry, it was decided that 10 per cent. of raw grain might be used in brewing without spoiling the article. Therefore, the brewer can use Russian barley to any extent he likes, or raw grain to the extent of 10 per cent., without spoiling the commodity. The hon. Member for Wimbledon also says you may use to any extent, without spoiling the commodity in any way, maize, sago, and rice. Are these the commodities that prevent people from standing on from £5 to £40 per ton. He remembered a gentleman connected with the firm of Bass saying he did not care what the price of hops was, because it was always necessary for a firm of that kind to use them, even if they were £30 instead of 30s. per cwt. He did not think it was fair for the right hon. Gentleman and others to attack these great firms on the ground of any advantage they would derive from the passing of this Amendment when, after all, it would only be rewarding them for supplying the public with a good article. As to any monopoly which large firms might enjoy, it was perfectly well known that in some foreign countries where the greatest and most elaborate experiments in the way of temperance legislation had been tried, they had taken the form of offering a monopoly to the best brewers and the brewers of the purest article. The Mover and Seconder of the Amendment did not say very much on the effect which the diminished use of barley had had upon the counties they respectively represented, and he should like to have heard from some practical Member representing a division of Essex of the disastrous effects which the diminished use of English, and perhaps the increased use of foreign, barley had had upon the barley growers of those districts. Certainly, in the County of Suffolk there were many miles of waste land to be seen together. They could, he believed, drive through 20 miles of waste land which formerly looked like those waving yellow fields which the Irish Chief Secretary once stated would be the result of the advent of a Liberal Administration. The case of the agriculturists whom he, in a certain measure, represented, differed entirely from that. Instead of their land being turned into a desert for those mysterious reasons which had made Essex assume the appearance it had, they had in the hop districts these green oases, in what would otherwise be a desert, entirely as a result of the cultivation of this exceptionally remunerative crop. It was not fair in considering this subject to entirely dismiss as unworthy of serious argument the immense encouragement which was given to the hop growers as well as the barley growers by the free use of hops and barley instead of the deleterious and noxious chemicals which took their place. It had been calculated that the use of hop substitutes was responsible for 10 per cent. of the diminution that had taken place in the hop acreage. Though he did not go so far as to endorse that, he still believed it was responsible for diminished employment, and it would be more so after the open advocacy of adulteration they had heard from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Member for the Sudbury Division calculated that if this Amendment were carried it would mean a loss to the Revenue of £250,000, and he proposed to make good this deficiency by imposing a licence which should be taken out by those who used substitutes for barley or hops. He was not sure that the hon. Member was quite right in his calculation, or that the tradesmen would altogether like advertising the fact that they had taken out licences to poison their customers. On the other hand, he was far from agreeing with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that where a house was known to sell bad compounds the consumers had the remedy in their own hands by leaving that house. For some extraordinary reason many of the rural population, he believed, actually preferred bad beer to good beer; and considerations of distance and the existence of tied houses often gave them no choice but to go to places where an adulterated article was supplied. As to this deficiency of Revenue, he must say two or three words on a subject that had been already referred to—namely, the Malt Duty, and a subject that had not been mentioned, the Hop Duty. He only wished to refer hon. Members who were curious on the subject to a Report recently presented to the Royal Commission on Agriculture by the Assistant Commissioner who was sent into the hop district round Maidstone. This gentleman said that the general opinion there was that, next to Free Trade, the repeal of the Malt Duty was the greatest misfortune that had befallen the farmer. With regard to the Hop Duty, that repeal was effected entirely under misconception as to the two duties at the time. It might fairly be said that there was a strong agitation among the growers for the repeal of one of them—namely, the Excise Duty; there never was any agitation, quite the reverse, for the repeal of the Customs Duty on foreign hops, which the growers always wished to retain. Instead, therefore, of imposing this

Mr. Brookfield

Licensing Duty to make up the deficit of £250,000, he should personally be in favour of re-imposing a duty for Revenue purposes upon foreign hops and foreign barley. Last year there was an importation of 185,112 cwt. of hops; and if a duty of 30s. had been imposed upon that it would have realised a revenue of £277,663, which was more than was required, or, with a 15s. duty, a revenue of £138,831, and the rest might very well have been made up by a revenue duty on barley. He should vote for this Amendment, and he earnestly hoped his hon. Friend the Member for the Sudbury Division would persevere in taking the sense of the Committee upon it.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, the previous night the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth said the hon. Member for South Tyrone would be driven through the Lobby in a brewer's van, but it appeared to him the Member for Cockermouth had a chance of being driven in a very rickety brewer's van by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself on the lives of adulterated beer. What was this Amendment? The question was, whether they should have a tax on barley or on the adulterated substitutes used in making beer? No one could doubt that the Beer Tax was nothing less than a tax upon barley. The Member for Wimbledon said the brewer did not intend to pay the tax on beer, and the Member for Bedford practically corroborated him, although he made a speech one way and voted the other.

MR. S. WHITBREAD (Bedford) : I did not corroborate him. I said that I intended to pay the tax myself.

MR. HENEAGE said, the hon. Member qualified it by a private intimation he had got from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should only pay it for one year, and he thought that was practically what the Member for Wimbledon said—namely, that it was only a temporary tax; that they would not disturb their relations with the trade, but that if it went on beyond that time they would not pay the tax. He had taken a great deal of trouble to inquire what would be the effect of the tax, and all persons agreed that its effect would be an imposition of 2s. per quarter on barley, and now his hon. Friend proposed that, instead of having this tax on barley, it should only be charged where barley was put on one side in order to use other substances. He considered that the Amendment was in the interest not only of the trade, but of temperance. The great temperance advocates said they did not like the people to be stupefied by drink. What did that mean but bad beer? All Magistrates would agree with him in saying that there were far more cases brought before the Police Courts of men being made ill and stupid by bad and adulterated beer than of men who became intoxicated through drinking good beer. Wholesome beer was self-satisfying and did good, but adulterated beer was not self-satisfying, and encouraged men to drink more. The trade ought to vote for the Amendment, because it would enable them to continue their business with good material and without any chance of unfair competition from those who used substances other than barley. With regard to the Malt Tax, he always opposed its repeal, both in the Chambers of Agriculture and in this House. He believed that the demand for its repeal was an infatuation which seized the country party, and which they had eventually had to pay for, and he was very glad to hear from them that they had come round to those opinions for the advocacy of which he was so much abused many years ago in the Chambers of Commerce, and that those who opposed him were now agreed that they had made a false step in regard to the Malt Tax. He believed the best thing would be for the Malt Tax to be re-imposed and the Beer Duty done away with. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was very hard upon the Member for the Sudbury Division for not having raised this question before. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that for the last 10 years there had been a Bill for pure beer before Parliament, but those who promoted it had received no facilities from any Government for bringing it forward, and consequently had been unable to pass it. He entirely agreed with what was said by the hon. Member for Essex the previous night, that, whatever anyone might say, either inside or outside the House, this Beer Tax was, in reality, a tax upon barley. He wanted to know why they should not have pure beer in this country? They had pure beer in a country from which more beer was exported than from any other—namely, Bavaria, and he believed there was less drunkenness and less spirits consumed in Bavaria than in almost any country in the world. Hops, barley, and yeast, with water, were all that were allowed to be used in brewing beer in that country, and the use of any other substances was punished as falsification by fine and imprisonment. The effect of this Amendment would be practically a fine on falsification or the adulteration of beer, and would only be acting on the good precedent which had been set for so many years in Bavaria. He regarded this Amendment as being in the interests of temperance, and of the health of the people, and he should certainly support it. It should be understood that those who voted for it were voting in favour of the pure article and those who voted against it in favour of adulteration.

MR. S. WHITBREAD (whose opening observations were very imperfectly heard in the Gallery) said, that as he was going to vote against this Amendment, he desired to explain his reason for doing so. He did not believe himself that if this Amendment were carried it would have the effect of increasing largely the price of English barley. The ground upon which British barley had been at such a high price under the old Malt Tax, and was in such great demand was that they got better extracts from British than from foreign barley. But they did not now propose to go back to the old system of the Malt Duty. If they could put it back, by a wave of the magician's wand, into the system which formerly existed, no one would be so glad as he, but a great many other things had happened. They would have to put up the old rate of duty, and he wondered what the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say to that? They would have to put back another thing—and that was the public-houses—to the prices they were at then. If they could not do these things, then it was no good. What would be the immediate effect of this Amendment if carried? The immediate effect of this Motion, if carried, would be to encourage very largely the consumption of foreign barley in substitution for some of the materials that were now used. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down talked about adulteration. What did the right hon. Gentleman mean by adulteration? Was it the use of anything that was not British barley?

MR. HENEAGE said, he had quoted the statement that in Bavaria nothing but malt and hops were used; and he should be glad to see that the case in England also.

MR. WHITBREAD asked his right hon. Friend to define the term "malt."

MR. HENEAGE said, he had never heard of any good malt but that made from barley.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that a Definition Clause would have to be introduced into the Bill, if the Amendment were carried, and that Definition Clause would be very difficult to draw. When the great change was made against the wish of every brewer in the Kingdom, and the duty was shifted from malt to barley, the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day openly proclaimed to the brewers that they might use whatever materials they liked, always providing that they were not deleterious. Was it imagined that by this simple Amendment that liberty was to be taken away? The effect of the change would be that it would tell in favour of the larger and wealthier firms, but disastrously against the smaller brewers. It had been charged against the larger firms that it was their greed which was swallowing up the smaller brewers, but this Amendment would provide a way of escape for the large firms, and levy the tax upon the small brewers. He was not at all sure that rice, maize, and sago were deleterious substances to use, in the sense of being injurious to health, although they were not the best articles for brewing with; but, having given liberty and encouraged a large number of brewers to provide cheap beer, made from cheaper materials, on what ground could Parliament turn round and say they should no longer use them, and thus practically ruin them? He supported the Government last night, and he was not going now to lay himself open to the charge of exposing to an adverse change the smaller houses that were less able than others to protect themselves against its consequences.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, the hon. Member for Bedford had told the Committee that he declined to support the Amendment because it would cast a burden, which he, in his generosity, was willing to bear himself on smaller and less fortunate brewers. But the proposal before the Committee was to present to the small brewers the alternative whether they would continue the practice of brewing from materials such as rice, sago, and maize, and pay the tax, or brew from English barley and avoid the tax. Consequently, it was inaccurate and unfair to present this Amendment as a proposal to shift the burden from the richer to the smaller brewers.

MR. WHITBREAD: I said I would not be a party to putting a tax on the smaller brewers, and finding a way of escape for myself.

MR. W. LONG said, the hon. Member was one of the most sagacious Members in the House, and surely he must see that the same alternative would be presented to the smaller brewer as to the larger brewer. The hon. Gentleman had told the Committee that he was not only a great brewer, but a virtuous brewer, and also so prosperous that, unlike other brewers, he intended to pay this duty himself, and not cast it upon the beer he brewed, and also that he would not support any proposal which would enable him to avoid the burden at the expense of his poorer brethren. But the hon. Member seemed to forget that his poorer brethren would have to bear the burden, whatever might be the extent of his individual patriotism. The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not intend to let the hon. Gentleman have the opportunity of displaying his generosity. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that all brewers—great and small, prosperous and poor, virtuous and vicious—should alike bear this additional burden. Therefore, the excellent intention of the hon. Gentleman could not be carried out, because his poorer and less fortunate brethren would have to pay the tax, whereas the Amendment would give them the opportunity of imitating the great and virtuous brewers or of being taxed for using less satisfactory ingredients. He desired to note the remarkable change which had taken place in the attitude of the hon. Gentleman opposite in consequence of the moving of this Amendment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer never lost a chance of jeering at landlords or brewers. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members would not upset his contention by saying "No, no"; they could not have been present during the Debates—the Chancellor of the Exchequer never lost an opportunity of jeering—whether it was the landlords or the brewers that were under discussion—and of attributing to them motives that were not altogether of an agreeable character, and of suggesting that they were acting altogether in self-interest. But now the right hon. Gentleman resisted this Amendment, and asked his temperance supporters to oppose it, because he said it would strike a fatal blow at small brewers and interfere with the Revenue by seriously injuring a class to whom the right hon. Gentleman looked to provide a large portion of the taxes of the State. That was a curious change of position taken up by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. He doubted, however, that they would be able to upset the argument which had been advanced in support of the Amendment. It might be admitted that the Amendment presented a question which would be better dealt with in a Bill. For his part, he would rather see the issue raised in the form of a Bill, but then they could not always have things as they liked in the House of Commons. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had been pleased to attack the Conservative Party because while in Office they did not find time to pass this proposal into law. The right hon. Gentleman knew very well that during the greater part of the time they were in Office they were in the position which the right hon. Gentleman himself now occupied, for the right hon. Gentleman had many projects he would be glad to see passed into law, but his desires were governed by the time at his disposal, and the mere fact that this proposal did not find its way to the Statute Book whilst the Conservative Party was in Office was no indication that there was not considerable sympathy in the Party with the proposal that some steps should be taken by Parliament to ensure that beer should be brewed from the most pure and healthful English ingredients. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had also referred to him as the agricultural Member for a great town. Well, if he, being identified with the agricultural interest in the West, represented a Northern constituency, it was an honour he shared with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he could only hope that they were both equally happy in their new homes. He supported the Amendment, because it tended to secure that beer would be brewed from natural and wholesome ingredients; and because he believed it would not have a bad effect on the Revenue.

*MR. BONSOR (Surrey, Wimbledon) said, he felt himself in rather a peculiar position, because he was, possibly for the first time, in accordance with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford as to the effect the Amendment, if carried, would have on small firms. He further believed that the proposal would render the Beer Act of 1880 unworkable, and he could not support an Amendment, however small, which would upset the compact arrived at in 1880. If a great change was to be brought about in the collection and assessment of the Beer Duty it must be after an exhaustive inquiry. He should vote against the Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I hope the Committee will bear in mind the important testimony borne by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford and by the hon. Member for Wimbledon. My statement that if this Amendment were carried it would lead to the destruction of the Revenue has been confirmed by those hon. Members. The Amendment is absolutely inconsistent with the settlement made in 1880 when the Malt Tax was repealed and when the whole trade was permitted to use whatever material they liked. Why were not Amendments like this moved in the time of the late Government? Where were the agricultural interests then? Where were the Members who wanted pure beer for the people and protection for British barley? Why would say these Amendments moved to put back another the late Government? the public-houses—nittee. Because it is were at then. If Amendment to move do these things, the Government and a good. What would be amendment for a effect of this Amendment said again in the e immediate effect of ittee, and I am carried, would be to ears for Bedford largely the consumption of Amendment is On substitution for some of which is pro- that were now used. The Member for Gentleman who had just sat small brewers and the large brewers, but everyone knows that the great brewer has resources in machinery—resources of science—by which he can extract, and properly extract, from barley a greater amount of that which goes to make beer than the smaller man can extract. But there is another matter. This Amendment is moved upon the Excise Clause alone. We have passed the Customs Clause, and therefore we may import any amount of cheap beer made from any kind of material which a brewer on the Continent may care to turn out. What effect would that have upon British barley and the British brewer? Any amount of sugar or sago and maize may be used in that beer. I cannot think the Committee will vote for this Amendment, which is absolutely unworkable, and under which it would be absolutely impossible to collect the Revenue.

MR. CAINE (Bradford, E.) said, many appeals had been made to the Temperance Party to support this Amendment, on the ground that it made in favour of temperance, but they did not admit that at all. He was sure the Temperance Party would give their votes without hesitation. Their antagonism was against alcohol, and they did not care whether it came from sugar, grain, or any other material. There had been many foolish arguments advanced in support of this ridiculous Amendment. It had been said, for instance, that in Bavaria the law enacted that beer should be made exclusively from barley. The law did nothing of the kind. It enacted that beer should be made from germinated grain, and germinated rice, maize, or wheat might be used. In fact, there was an attempt in this Amendment to set up in this country the worst form of Protection—that of bounties. It was proposed that bounties should be given to the brewing trade if they used English barley, and in that way Protection would be given to the agricultural interest. The whole discussion might be summed up in the following epigram, the authorship of which he was not permitted to divulge—

"It seems as sure 'as eggs is eggs,'
From all that has been said,
That impure beer affects the legs
While pure affects the head."

MR. EVERSLED (Staffordshire, Burton) said, that at Burton-on-Trent, at any rate, they had always prided themselves on brewing only pure beer ; and he could, therefore, assure the hon. Member that the graphic description of the effect of drinking beer which he had just cited could not have applied to any beer that had been brewed in his constituency. Last night the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth had described the brewing industry as the one green spot in the oasis of depressed trade and commerce. That description of the trade might have been given before the late Chancellor of the Exchequer raised the Beer Duties ; and now that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer had added another 6d., he wished someone would tell the brewers how they were to get their daily bread. He was afraid his tendency was to vote against the proposed increase in the Beer Duty in whatever form it might be raised. He did so last night. He felt bound to say that his votes were given upon the conviction he held, that it was rather hard that the working classes in this country who made beer their favourite beverage, and had none of the many comforts and luxuries of the rich, should have to pay this additional taxation upon the one article which they drank. He was not sure that the Government did not very much underrated the feeling of the working classes of this country, and he was afraid it would be felt at the next General Election. They all knew that as a general rule taxes were paid by consumers, and it was they who would have to pay the additional tax. They recognised also that the favourite drinks of the upper classes, which they themselves could not afford to pay, were untaxed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was not just that the rich, who could afford to drink expensive wines, should not have a proportionate increase of taxation placed upon their beverages also. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the tendency now was for the smaller brewers to disappear, and for the trade to get into the hands of large capitalists and companies. That was practically true ; but was it desirable in the interests of the public ? Did they desire to squeeze out the small capitalists and to have all the brewing trade in the country in the hands of the rich ? The effect of that process had been going on for a considerable time, and it was to develop the tied-house system which was at the root of so many of the evils that they all deplored. He would undertake to say that before many years had passed those old free houses, the traditions of which were so interesting in our social life, would have disappeared altogether, and that the mechanical arrangements involved in the tied-house system would be perpetuated throughout this country, and very much to the disadvantage of the working classes. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was a man of many resources, and he did not think it would puzzle him much to obtain £500,000. He had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman looked forward to be Chancellor of the Exchequer for many years to come ; he trusted his hopes might be fulfilled, and he invited the right hon. Gentleman to do that which had apparently been beyond the powers of any Chancellor of the Exchequer of recent years to do—to keep down, control, and moderate the monstrous expenditure to which this country had attained.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, he was glad that his hon. Friend the Member for East Bradford had taken pains to make it clear that on this question there was no temperance issue involved, and that Members holding the strongest temperance views might reasonably take different views. [Ironical cheers.] He had repeated just what the hon. Member for East Bradford had said, and if the Committee was looking for a temperance authority, perhaps they would choose his hon. Friend rather than some Members below the Gangway on the opposite side. If there was any temperance principle involved in this question it lay in this : that every shilling of revenue derived from drink made temperance legislation more difficult to obtain. They were now at the close of one of the most remarkable Sittings they had ever had. The Sitting began with a lively Scotch Debate—which was a remarkable thing in itself—and was continued by a controversy between agriculturists and brewers, which was another extraordinary thing ; but the most extraordinary thing was a remark of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the course of his last speech. The right hon. Gentleman was talking about shearing sheep, and he hoped that his an honour he shared with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he could only hope that they were both equally happy in their new homes. He supported the Amendment, because it tended to secure that beer would be brewed from natural and wholesome ingredients; and because he believed it would not have a bad effect on the Revenue.

Because it is a very convenient Amendment to move against a Liberal Government and a very inconvenient Amendment for a Tory Government. I said again in the presence of the Committee, and I am confirmed by the Members for Bedford and Wimbledon, that this Amendment is destructive of the Revenue which is produced from beer. The hon. Member for Liverpool referred to the small brewers and the large brewers, but everyone knows that the great brewer has resources in machinery—resources of science—by which he can extract, and properly extract, from barley a greater amount of that which goes to make beer than the smaller man can extract. The right hon. Gentleman was talking about shearing sheep, and he hoped that his friends the brewers would keep themselves in good condition for the shears to be used again. That was said by a gentleman who had a notice on the Order Paper for the Second Reading of a Bill to enable householders to abolish the trade altogether. He did not know that there was such a thing as a Temperance Party in the House; but if there were, surely they could understand an intimation like that, and could see what the value of the temperance pledges of the Government was. With regard to the rival kinds of beer, he did not know whether they were good or bad, adulterated or not. What was the poor unfortunate man who wished a glass of pure beer to do? His hon. Friend the Member for Bedford said that if the proposal were carried it would be impossible for the brewer to live. Let the Committee fancy that calamity being brought on the country! He was accused last night by the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth of being driven through the Lobby in a brewer's van. What was his hon. Friend going to drive in to-day? He was, he thought, going in a brewer's dray, horsed by the hon. Member for Bedford and the hon. Member for Wimbledon, to follow a triumphant course through the Division Lobby under the auspices of those two eminent temperance reformers. It was difficult to get at the merits of this question; but as his hon. Friend was for pure beer, and those two gentlemen were for adulterating it, he had come to the conclusion that if there was any virtue in it at all, pure beer must be the best, and he was going to vote for it. These things could only be of a temperance character if they proposed to reduce the consumption of drink, and from 1851 no increase of duty had ever tended to lessen the consumption of drink in this country, as we were consuming the same amount per head of the population as was drunk before the duty was raised. He did not know very well what he was doing, having no experience in the question of good and bad beer, but he thought he would, on this occasion at any rate, vote for the Amendment on the assumption that it aimed at providing beer that was pure and less harmful than the article manufactured by the hon. Member for Bedford, whom he saw described the other day as "an umpire who never once gave his own side out."

Mr. T. W. Russell

*MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye) said, he much regretted that some hon. Members who had spoken during the Debate seemed to consider that hon. Gentlemen would give their vote for or against the Amendment, according to whether they were supporters or not of the adulterated or of the unadulterated article. That had nothing to do with the point before the Committee. For eight years his name had been on the back of a Bill brought in by his hon. Friend the Member for Sudbury, and if that Bill were to be brought forward in a substantive form, he would support it in the future as he had supported it in the past. That Bill proposed to recognise the principle that the purchaser should be entitled to know what he was buying. The hon. Member who had just sat down had said he was going to vote, not knowing what he was going to do. What he (Mr. Stevenson) wanted was that the purchaser should know what he was doing, and the proposal contained in this Amendment differed absolutely from the proposal which was in the Bill of the Member for Sudbury, which provided that it should be stated what ingredients were contained in the beer offered for sale. The present proposal was, in effect, to impose a penalty upon those who brewed beer in a particular way, but it did not provide the adequate machinery by which that proposal could be carried into effect, and no provision to prevent the public from being taken in by unscrupulous traders. That being so, while he was heartily in favour of the proposal that the purchaser should know what he was buying, he was not prepared to vote for the present proposal until it had been more fully considered.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 196; Noes 253:—(Division List, No. 132.)

MR. BIGWOOD (Middlesex, Brentford) moved, in page 17, line 5, after "gravity," to insert—

"but this extra Excise Duty of 6d. per gallon shall not be chargeable upon those brewing 1,000 barrels or less per annum, and that a graduated and reduced duty, to be hereinafter fixed by the Inland Revenue Department, shall be chargeable upon all persons brewing less than 5,000 and more than 1,000 barrels per annum."

He said that he had been induced to move this Amendment entirely owing to facts that had come within his own observation. He had seen with great regret the diminishing number of the smaller brewers, and, as this was generally considered a democratic Budget, he thought the Amendment would afford the Chancellor of the Exchequer an opportunity to do something for those smaller traders, whom he did not wish to see annihilated. They had heard in this Debate of those who brewed beer of such a character that those who drank it went into the hayfields with wooden legs. He would be accused, perhaps, of supporting that class of manufacturers, but that was not his view. He believed there were among the smaller brewers many who brewed the most legitimate article entirely from malt and hops, and who were not sufficiently educated to know the merits or demerits of any particular nostrum which might be added to beer to improve its quality. He was prepared to take a much smaller class of brewer than that indicated in his Amendment. He had brought it forward to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer an opportunity of doing that which he had done in regard to the Income Tax, of protecting this smaller class from a duty which they could ill afford to pay. He was quite sure that this extra duty would have the effect of closing many of the smaller houses.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 5, after the word "gravity," to insert the words—

"but this extra Excise Duty of 6d. per gallon shall not be chargeable upon those brewing 1,000 barrels or less per annum, and that a graduated and reduced duty, to be hereinafter fixed by the Inland Revenue Department, shall be chargeable upon all persons brewing less than 5,000 and more than 1,000 barrels per annum."—(Mr. Bigwood.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the Amendment of the hon. Member could not be accepted, though he should be very glad to do something for the small brewers if it were possible. It was, however, extremely difficult to make differential charges in matters of this kind. The hon. Member proposed that the Inland Revenue should be empowered to fix a scale of graduation. That was a very tempting offer, and he thought he might make a very good thing out of the plan if it were practicable. He doubted, however, whether it was practicable, and it certainly would give rather too much power to the Inland Revenue. The Amendment was not workable, and he feared, therefore, that he could not assent to the hon. Member's proposal.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said, he did not wish to divide the Committee, but he still held the opinion, in spite of the very fair reply which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made to him last night, that by imposing this extra duty upon beer the Government were really forcing the brewers to use other than English materials; in fact, they were creating a protective duty in favour of foreign materials as against honest English barley.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 26 agreed to.

Clause 27.

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) raised an objection from the Irish point of view. He opposed the clause on the ground that the additional tax would injuriously affect Irish interests. An additional sum of £195,000 would under this provision be collected in Ireland this year. Were he to vote for the clause he would be abandoning the position occupied for 20 years by the Irish Party, who had maintained throughout that period that Ireland was over-taxed. They would by assenting to this proposal be admitting not only that Ireland was not over-taxed, but that she had not even been defraying her fair share of taxation in the past. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had fulfilled his promise that the tax should only be imposed for one year, but he had carefully abstained from promising that he would use his influence next year to prevent the re-imposition of the charge. The object of all this additional taxation was to provide means for increasing the Fleet, but this expenditure on war material ought not to be provided out of income, but by a loan or by the suspension of part of the payment for the reduction of the National Debt. Irishmen were not particularly interested either in the Navy or in questions of foreign policy, and therefore he did not see why they should pay this extra duty. None of the dockyards were in Ireland; all the dockyards were to be found in Great Britain, and consequently none of the money spent on shipbuilding went out of the country. Even when the fleets were despatched to the Irish Coast for manoeuvres there was no expenditure for the benefit of the people there. The fact was, that this extra duty would be taken out of Ireland and not spent in that country. All the Irish Members ought to protest against this increase. It was urged that they ought to support the Budget because the Liberal Party had brought in Irish measures; but in submitting to this taxation he contended that they would weaken their position for obtaining reforms and concessions from England.

MR. BUTCHER (York), apart from the general question of the bearing of the clause, objected to this duty on the ground that it would tax spirits used for medical purposes.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he was compelled to rise to Order. The hon. and learned Member was not present when an Amendment on the same subject was moved on a previous clause and when he gave his explanation on that Amendment and it was negatived. An understanding was then come to that the same question should not be raised both on the Customs and on the Excise Duties.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that any discussion on that subject would be out of Order.

MR. BUTCHER thought he might be allowed to state his reasons for objecting to the clause. It was generally known that spirits were used very largely for medical purposes.

Several hon. MEMBERS : Order, order !

THE CHAIRMAN : I have already called the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman to the fact that such a discussion as he proposes to raise would be out of Order. The Amendment on that point is no longer before the House.

Colonel Nolan

*MR. BONSOR (Surrey, Wimbledon) moved to report Progress, as he was aware several hon. Members wished to speak.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Bonsor.)

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that under the circumstances he could not assent to that. An understanding had been come to that the clause was to be taken.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 186 ; Noes 238.—(Division List, No. 133.)

It being after half-past Five of the clock, the Chairman proceeded to interrupt the Business :—

Whereupon The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 238 ; Noes 183.—(Division List, No. 134.)

Question put accordingly, "That Clause 27 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 237 ; Noes 182.—(Division List, No. 135.)

It being after Six of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress : to sit again To-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 1) BILL.
(No. 5.)

Reported, without Amendment [Provisional Order confirmed] ; to be read the third time To-morrow.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 3) BILL.—(No. 244.)

As amended, considered ; to be read the third time To-morrow.

It being after Six of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at eight minutes after Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 28th June 1894.

THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF YORK.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Earl of ROSEBURY), in moving

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to congratulate Her Majesty on the birth of a son and heir to His Royal Highness the Duke of York and Her Royal Highness the Duchess of York," said : It is, my Lords, with the purest and most unmingled gratification that I rise to move the Address of which I have given notice. It is scarcely one that in an Assembly of this kind needs any words to recommend it. It is, of course, impossible in the affairs of this world to hope for any absolute guarantee against any possible evil. But I am bound to say that no more gratifying guarantee could be given of the permanence of that form of government under which we live than the fact that the Queen should be able to see around her to-day no less than three heirs male in the direct line of that historic Throne of which she is the ornament. [Cheers.] My Lords, I am not here to-day to discuss the relative advantages of various forms of government. I take it that in that, as in other things, nations have the government which they prefer, and which suits them best. But of this I am at least sure—that there is one form of government, and one alone, which seems fitted for the people of these islands ; and that is, the ancient, limited, historic Monarchy under which we have lived for so many centuries. [Cheers.] My Lords, it is quite true that in the lapse of time that Monarchy has assumed functions rather social than political ; but that, in my opinion, is in itself an advantage at a moment when the questions which, as I believe, most interest the people of this country are rather social than political themselves. ["Hear, hear!"] From the Throne for 57 years past we have had an example of purity and dignity of life such as has never been exhibited to the same degree from the same eminence. [Cheers.] Of Her Majesty's Family it does not become me to say much to-day, because, after all, generalities on subjects of this kind are apt to become either fulsome or unmeaning. But we may at least say this—that by their example and by their sympathy with the nation in the various pursuits and objects which this nation has at heart, they have sweetened the air of these Three Kingdoms. ["Hear, hear!"] My Lords, in the old traditions of France there was a title given to the sons of the Monarch which has always seemed to me the noblest and the most pathetic that any Prince could bear. They were called "the sons of France." May we not hope that this newborn child may come to be in truth a son of Great Britain, and be adequate to the high conditions and responsibilities which that noble title involves? [Cheers.]

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in seconding the Motion, said : My Lords, the gratification which the noble Lord feels in making this Motion is a feeling in which he will command the hearty sympathy of every person in this House. ["Hear, hear!"] I have little to add to the graceful and eloquent words in which the noble Lord has moved this Motion. We must all feel anxious to congratulate our Sovereign on this auspicious occasion, which has added to her domestic happiness and to the domestic happiness of the distinguished parents of this child—[cheers]—and not only on account of the sympathy which we naturally feel for their feelings in such a matter, but also because we owe so deep a debt of gratitude to the beneficent government of the Family under whose rule we live. The noble Lord has justly said that this form of government is best fitted for the people of these islands. I should expand that phrase by saying that it is the best fitted, and the only possible form of government for the vast Empire of which England is the centre. [Cheers.] It has an importance to us now at the present day even in excess of the value which it represented to our ancestors ; because it is the only centre round which could rally the vast multitudes of different creeds and races which acknowledge the sway of Queen Victoria. [Cheers.] My Lords, we cannot look into the future ; but I heartily join with the noble Lord in expressing the feeling that this auspicious birth has given us a just confidence in believing that in the far future we and our descendants are secure in enjoying that form of government which has conferred so much greatness upon these little islands, and which has given so large a measure of happiness to the nations which inhabit them. [Cheers.]

Moved—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to congratulate Her Majesty on the birth of a son and heir to His Royal Highness the Duke of York and Her Royal Highness the Duchess of York."—(The Lord President (E. Rosebery).)

Address agreed to, nemine dissentiente: Ordered that the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

BOARDS OF CONCILIATION BILL.

(No. 112.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW, in moving the Second Reading, disclaimed, in the first place, the parentage of the Bill. It had been, in reality, prepared by Sir John Lubbock, the representative of the London County Council upon the Labour Conciliation and Arbitration Board of the London Chamber of Commerce. The general principle of the Bill would commend itself to their Lordships, for he was sure they were all anxious to see some steps taken by which an early termination might be put to those unfortunate labour disputes which had brought such widespread misery. The method by which the supporters of the measure hoped to attain that object was by strengthening the existing voluntary Boards. Those Boards were of three different kinds: first, the Standing Joint Committees comprised of employers and employed in any particular trade covering an area, large or small; secondly, the Trade Boards of Conciliation and Arbitration embracing the whole of a particular trade or group of trades within a wide area, possibly throughout the whole country; lastly, the District Boards existing in certain circumscribed localities, chiefly populous places, for the purpose of dealing by conciliation or arbitration with all trade questions arising within the area of their operations. Three methods of procedure were adopted by the last-named Boards: either they invited the parties in dispute to meet at a convenient place and settle their differences, or, if that could not be done, the Boards offered their services as mediators, and endeavoured to reconcile the two parties by giving them useful advice; and, lastly, if neither of those courses could be taken, it was open to the Boards, with the consent of the two parties, to take the whole matter into their consideration and to decide the question in dispute. But there was yet a fourth matter of procedure not familiar to us in this country, but very common in America. He would call it by the name which best explained its object—procedure by declaration. That was to say, the Board heard both sides of the case, and, having done so, declared what in their opinion would be a fair and equitable settlement of the differences between them, leaving them either to accept or reject it. The result was, that in the majority of cases public opinion, which was no small factor in these cases, was inclined to accept the award of the Board as right and just, and in many cases the declaration led to the settlement of the difficulty on those lines. Legislation, to a certain extent, was already in existence on this subject, and, looking at the result of it so far, he felt compelled to say he was not very sanguine of the result of any interference by Parliament. In 1824 an Act was passed for forming a Board of six arbitrators, to be appointed by a Magistrate, with power to settle and enforce their decrees, and they were authorised, in case either party should refuse to accept their awards, to enforce their decrees by distress or even by imprisonment; but from the scope of their operations was expressly excluded the settlement of either future wages or future prices. In 1867, voluntary Boards having by that time become somewhat general, Lord St. Leonards brought in a Bill conferring upon these Boards the same powers as had been conferred upon the arbitrators under the Act of 1824, and giving them additional powers of summoning witnesses. Again, in 1872 Mr. Mundella, then President of the Board of Trade, introduced the Arbitration (Masters and Workmen) Act, providing that, in addition to disputes arising out of existing contracts, the arbitrators might take into consideration future wages and future prices. The result of all those measures, he regretted to say, had been absolutely nil. He was not aware of a single case in which either employers or workmen had availed themselves of that Act. The reason appeared to be twofold: first, it was not the business of anybody to put those Boards in operation, and, consequently, 999 out of every 1,000 workmen in this country were absolutely ignorant of their existence; and, secondly, those who were aware of their existence were loth to put themselves voluntarily in the position of giving powers to a Magistrate to enforce the award of the Boards by so severe a process as distress, and, possibly, imprisonment. This Bill would avoid, at any rate, the latter of those two difficulties, because the legal powers it would give were much less severe than those given by the Act of 1872. Its provisions would apply to all properly-constituted Boards of Conciliation and Arbitration. It was made a sine quâ non of recognition by the State that it should consist in equal degrees of employers and employed, and where the Board of Trade was satisfied that was the case it might, after due examination into the circumstances, register it as a voluntry Board under this Act (if passed). Secondly, it was proposed to confer upon the Boards power to summon witnesses and to administer to them the oath. Power was also given upon the order of the High Court to subpoena witnesses to give evidence, provided the evidence was such as would be producible upon the trial of an ordinary action; but it specially exempted from the evidence that might be given before Boards two matters upon which both employers and employed were somewhat touchy: no power was given to inquire either into the books of an employer showing profit and loss in any industrial undertaking, or to require production of any books or papers of a Trades Union. Everything in the Bill was voluntary. No power was conferred upon a Board and no authority could be exercised by it without the consent of both parties. It might, however, be considered possible to give the Boards a certain measure of authority for enforcing their decrees in respect to any question of future wages or future prices. For that purpose a clause had been inserted enabling the parties, should they so desire it, to deposit in Court a sum of money, or security for a sum of money, which, in the event of the award not being observed by either party, would be forfeited by the Board and handed over by them to the other party which was prepared to abide by the award. Those were the principal provisions of the Bill. He asked their Lordships to look for a moment at the rules of procedure contained in the Schedule to the Bill. They were made as elastic as possible, and only laid down broad principles on which the Boards should act. First, they might allow the use of any chamber or building over which they might have authority for the purpose of holding meetings between parties in dispute; secondly, they might act, if the parties so desired it, as mediators between them; and, thirdly, in the event of their being unable to come to an agreement in any other manner, they might (if both parties agreed in writing to submit to the Board) either themselves act as arbitrators or appoint arbitrators to act provided they were in equal numbers; and in case of difference power was given to them (still with the consent of the parties) to appoint an umpire or to invite the Board of Trade to do so. The powers it was proposed to confer on these Boards were very similar (though there were certain differences to which he would call attention) to the functions performed by perhaps the most successful tribunal of the kind that had ever existed—the Conseils des Prud'hommes in France. Those Conseils had been in existence for a long time. In the reign of Philippe le Bel in 1295 they had their inception; and they were constituted in their present form by the First Napoleon in 1806. During their existence they had been a remarkable success; and the authorities in France attributed to their existence the comparative tranquillity in the French industries during the present century. In 1890, 136 of those Conseils were in existence. They had tried 42,000 actions, 16,000 of which were settled by conciliation, 13,000 by arbitration, and 12,000 were withdrawn. The similarity between these Conseils and the Boards which it was sought to invest with powers under this Bill was this: both of them had powers of arbitration as well as of conciliation; both of them must consist of equal members; both possessed power to summon witnesses; the awards of both as to the existing contracts were enforceable by law, and excepting where security had been voluntarily deposited (as he had already explained) neither of them could deal with questions of future wages or future prices. The main points of difference between those Conseils and the Boards under this Bill were that, whereas in France they could decide questions without the consent of parties—and indeed where one party to the suit did not put in an appearance judgment would be given against them by default—under this Bill, no judgment could be given without the consent of the parties. Again, the Conseils in France had absolutely no power to consider questions of future wages, but that power was to be given to these Boards where both parties were prepared to deposit a sum of money as security for their ultimately carrying the award into effect. That was a very modified form of compulsion, but it was not thought possible to bring compulsion to bear upon either employers or workmen. They could not say to a man, “You shall work or not work for a certain wage”; and they could not say to an employer, “You shall carry on your business, although it may be at a loss”; and, therefore, it was not sought in any way to enforce the decision of the Board in the matter of wages. But the supporters of this measure recognised that the feeling was growing on the part both of employers and employed in favour of the extension of these voluntary Boards. Mr. Burnett stated in the Report on Strikes in 1892 that 7,500 employers and 196 Unions, comprising 90,000 members, advocated the formation of local Boards. Perhaps the most successful had been the London Labour Conciliation and Arbitration Board. That Board came into existence in consequence of the Dock strike in 1889. The London Chamber of Commerce was approached by 3,000 firms who had been grievously affected by the magnitude of that strike. A committee was formed to inquire what could be done, and the result of their Report was the institution of that Board, the object of which was not so much to act as arbitrators, but to form some scheme of conciliation and to develop that scheme. The main condition which appeared to be essential to this scheme was that both parties should be equally represented on the Board, and that the Board should, as far as possible, embrace among its representatives all the trades carrying on business in the locality. In order to obtain that result committees elected by the Trades Unions and the employers in each of the principal trades in London had been constituted and affiliated to the Central Board. The procedure of the Board was very simple: As soon as they heard that a strike was impending, or that a difference was likely to arise, they sent an identical letter to both parties, offering them the use of the Chamber of Commerce for a meeting, and requesting them to meet there and try to arrange their difficulties, and, if they desired it, that members of the Board should sit in the room and, whenever their offices were called for, intervene and suggest some means by which the dispute might be settled. They had done good work, the best part of which did not find its way into the public prints, and of which the public had but little knowledge. They had settled about 20 considerable disputes between employers and employed, and a large number of smaller ones. Indeed, hardly a week passed without some application being made to that Board to intervene in disputes between employers and employed. Unfortunately, the recent strike of cab-drivers was not referred to them. They offered their services, but the parties did not seem to be willing to come to any terms in the matter. But they had settled another threatened strike, which otherwise would have been a great deal heard of, among the men employed by the Victoria Steam Packet Company. There was at one time danger that the whole passenger traffic on the Thames would be suspended; but that strike was happily averted by the intervention of the Board. Had they done that work alone they would deserve well of the Metropolis and of the country. That Board was the author of the present Bill. Its principle had been approved not only by the London Chamber of Commerce, but by a conference of Chambers of Commerce all over the Empire, over which his noble Friend opposite, Lord Brassey, presided. It had also been submitted in all its details to, and approved by, a Congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom. So far for the approval of employers of labour who might be said to be represented by the Chambers of Commerce. But the Bill had also been approved of by about 40 Trades Unions in the Metropolis, including the engineers, carpenters, tailors, clerks, and many other important bodies of operatives. It had been discussed clause by clause by their representatives, and might be said to thoroughly embody the views of the working classes of London. It was backed by Conservative Members of Parliament such as Sir Francis Powell and Sir Albert Rollit, by Unionist Members like Sir John Lubbock, by Liberal Members like Mr. Montagu, and by such representatives of labour as Mr. Howell and Mr. Fenwick. Her Majesty's Government had no doubt introduced a Bill dealing with this subject, but there appeared to be nothing in it which could not be done under those existing Acts of Parliament, which had proved complete failures. It would be more useful if the Government, instead of endeavouring to set up new Boards, which it had been shown both employers and employed shrank from, would frankly and freely recognise the voluntary Boards already established and clothe them with authority, which would make them respected by all parties in the State. A few words as to the reason why he had introduced this Bill in their Lordships' House. The Government, speaking by the mouth of Mr. Mundella, the then President of the Board of Trade, undertook that they would not offer any opposition to the Bill if it were introduced in the other House; but when this Bill came up for Second Reading, they regretted that they were unable to fulfil their undertaking owing to the fact that their Bill had been blocked; and as the Government had taken the whole time of the other House, it was impossible for the Bill to be introduced there this Session. He had, therefore, brought the Bill before their Lordships' House to obtain a discussion upon it, and to elicit the intentions of Her Majesty's Government, even if it should be impossible to get it passed this Session. The Bill if passed might not affect all the gigantic struggles happening between capital and labour with which the nation had become familiar, but it would at any rate deal with two out of the three great causes of dispute—those arising upon questions of wages and hours. Whether it would be sufficient to deal with that much more burning question whether members of Trades Unions should work alongside men who were not, he was not prepared to say; but at any rate he had the authority of Mr. Howell, who was well versed in the subject and had written a book upon it, for saying that 90 per cent. of the strikes that occurred might be settled by conciliation, and, of the remaining 10, 5 per cent. might be settled by arbitration. Above all, it was desirable to narrow the issues which those questions raised, and to do away with some of the ignorance surrounding them, and the distrust, for sometimes even the very causes of strikes themselves were non-existent. The Board he had referred to dealt with a dispute between the French-Polishers' Union and a large firm of pianoforte makers, the cause of quarrel being that the men thought time-work preferable to piece-work; but when they met together in the room, and the cases on either side were stated, it was found that, after all, the men themselves were in agreement with the masters as to piece-work, and a strike which might have assumed large proportions was settled in a few minutes. There was, he ventured to think, a brighter prospect ahead of us in regard to the settlement of trade disputes, and there had been of late a marked desire for their settlement by conciliation, as appeared by the Report of Mr. Burnett. The Returns of recent years showed a marked decrease in the number of strikes. In 1882, which might be said to be the year of high-water mark or fever heat of the strikes, there were 1,845; in 1890 there were 1,028; in 1891 there were 890; while in 1892 the number had diminished to 692. That was satisfactory; but against it had to be set the lamentable coal strike last year, when 300,000 men were idle, with 500,000 persons dependent upon them, and it was estimated that not less than £19,000,000 of capital lay idle; in 1892 3,000 establishments were affected by strikes. The most lamentable part of it all was the result of the strikes to the workers themselves, for the larger proportion were unsuccessful, and the net result of all the misery to the men and enforced idleness of capital was an average reduction of strikers' wages of $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. In presence of those figures anything that could be done to minimise the recurrence of strikes should be done. All would agree, therefore, that this Bill was for a worthy object. He did not anticipate that the measure would be received with enthusiasm. Any measure which simply aimed at holding the balance equally between employers and employed was not likely to be received with enthusiasm by either Party; but at any rate it was an experiment which, if it were passed, could do no harm and might be productive of great good. Courts with strong legal powers had been tried; an endeavour had been made to establish voluntary Boards by the machinery of the law, but now their Lordships were asked to clothe the existing Boards with more modified legal powers in the belief that those Boards commanded the confidence both of employers and employed. Many of their Lordships had made voyages to Australia, and must have felt a thrill of national pride on passing ship after ship carrying valuable cargoes under the Union Jack. They must have had a feeling of glory in the Empire to which they belonged as their vessel touched at port after port, in the Mediterranean, in the Suez Canal, in the Pacific and Indian Oceans, filled with shipping and with busy wharves teeming with life and work. He had seen those wharves all deserted, and the ships lying idle at the decree of the Labour Organisations—the wool trade, the staple industry of the Australian continent was paralysed. Men were forbidden to shear the wool to form the cargoes; those who should have put it on the railways were forbidden to handle it; wharfingers were forbidden to put it into the ships, while the sailors were forbidden to navigate them if they contained the “boycotted” wool; even the stevedores in the London Docks were forbidden to touch it upon its arrival here. That such a paralysis of our commerce through industrial disputes should be possible constituted not only a grave menace to the community, which might at any moment be deprived of the very necessities of life, but was evidence of the smallness of the advance which had been made in this 19th century over the barbarous methods of settling disputes which prevailed among our more remote ancestors. The prosperity of England depended on her commercial superiority, and, having made great sacrifices with the object of holding our position as the greatest manufacturing country in the world, we ought also to do something to mitigate what he believed to be one of the gravest menaces to our commercial superiority—namely, the enormous waste caused by constant recurrence of these industrial campaigns. If they thought that this Bill would tend in that direction, they would in passing it have something on which to congratulate themselves. This question was, at any rate, more worthy the attention of Parliament than others which occupied most of its time—mere Party squabbles. In the belief that their Lordships would all desire to advance the question at least one step, he asked them to read this Bill a second time.

LORD BRASSEY, in seconding the Motion, said that he had only a word or two to add to the exhaustive speech of the noble Lord opposite on behalf of the Conciliation Board appointed under the auspices of the London Chamber of Commerce. Those who had been employed in the settlement of trade disputes in the Metropolis had been earnest and successful workers. He could not lose the opportunity of saying how greatly, in his opinion, the method of adjustment by Conciliation Boards was to be preferred to the method of arbitration. An arbitrator was never called in till considerable exacerbation of feeling had been aroused on both sides, and he must necessarily purchase his impartiality at the cost of much ignorance of essential technical details. The supporters of this Bill desired simply that it should be referred to the same Select Committee with the Government Bill, and he earnestly hoped that their Lordships would accede to this reasonable request. He concluded by seconding the Motion that the Bill be now read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Onslow.)

*LORD PLAYFAIR said, their Lordships would all sympathise with the noble Lord in the motive with which he had brought the Bill before the House. The constant blows that were struck against commerce by strikes had become so serious that everyone desired to find a method by means of Boards of Conciliation which would win the confidence of the working classes and of employers alike to prevent these disputes reaching the acute stage of strikes. Therefore, every one in the House would thoroughly appreciate the principle and motive of the noble Lord in introducing this Bill. But some difficulties stood in the way. There were three Bills on this subject before the House of Commons at the present time—namely, the Government Bill; the Bill of Sir J. Lubbock, which was identical with the one now introduced by the noble Earl; and the Bill of Mr. Butcher and Sir J. Gorst. The latter also proposed another mode of establishing Conciliation Boards, by means of County Councils instead of the Board of Trade. The desire of the Government was that all these Bills should be read a second time and sent to the Grand Committee on Trade in the House of Commons, where their respective merits would be examined. Each of them contained excellent suggestions which might be combined in one valuable measure, there being no Party feeling in any of them. But all the Bills were blocked. The noble Lord desired a discussion on the subject on the Second Reading of this Bill, which he had very ably advocated, but he had not explained the advantages of the Government Bill which was not before their Lordships. Neither could the other two Bills in the House of Commons be now discussed, all being for the same object and containing suggestions well worthy of attention. As the noble Lord had said, they had no doubt plenty of time in that House to discuss the matter, and in Standing Committee their Lordships could have made an excellent Bill out of the three, which the Government could have accepted and pushed forward. But that was not the feeling of people interested in the question of conciliation, who desired to get the opinion of the people's House upon it.

The noble Lord had taken one of those Bills and introduced it before their Lordships; but as they could not discuss the others, they were placed in a difficult position. He had no fundamental objection to the Bill of the noble Earl, although he thought it was not sufficiently elastic, and contained too much legal phraseology. The noble Lord had put so much legal phraseology into the Bill that he would frighten the working classes from adopting it. For instance, in the seventh clause were mentioned subpoena ad testificandum and duces tecum, legal terms familiar to lawyers; but they would cause great alarm among the working classes, who would be summoned in those imposing words, which they might suppose had some tremendous meaning. Then the noble Lord brought in the law to confirm the judgment or award. He had had a little experience in 1877 as umpire in an important strike arbitration affecting Northumberland and Durham, and that arbitration had a large measure of success, because the parties had confidence in the Court being exactly adjusted to the dispute, the employers and workmen being equally represented, as proposed, in this Bill. If the subject were left to be discussed in the House of Commons by the Grand Committee on Trade, the valuable suggestions made would be considered with the view of forming Boards of Conciliation. What he suggested was that if the Bill were read a second time the noble Earl should delay its further stages for some time in the hope that meanwhile the block in the three Bills in the House of Commons would be removed and the whole of them sent to the Grand Committee. Unless that was done the Bill would not go down to the other House with that satisfactory feeling that all sides had been heard, which were so desirable in a measure of this kind.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: My Lords, the noble Lord who has just spoken on behalf of the Government has addressed his observations so exclusively to the noble Lord who moved the Second Reading of this Bill that I confess I have some difficulty in ascertaining what the position of the Government is with regard to it. I understand he does not intend to oppose the Second Reading, but that he asks for considerable delay in further proceeding with it in order that, if possible, the proposal of the Government may be considered at the same time with the other Bills in the House of Commons. That may be very desirable, but I do not understand how the other Bills are to be before this House. They are in a suspended state, and I would ask whether the noble Lord can hold out any hope of the Bills before the House of Commons being read a second time? As I understand matters, it is absolutely impossible at present to proceed with any business in the House of Commons except Government Bills.

LORD PLAYFAIR said, that if the blocks were withdrawn from the three Bills in the House of Commons they might be read a second time and sent to the Grand Committee of the Board of Trade, to be considered all together before their Lordships proceeded to the Committee stage of this Bill.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE said, he understood it was impossible that any Bills in the other House could go before a Grand Committee this year.

LORD PLAYFAIR said, that would depend on the blocks being withdrawn.

LORD KNUTSFORD suggested that it would be better to pass the Bill now before the House, and let it join its blocked friends in the House of Commons. It could then go before the Grand Committee.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: I am afraid that would not facilitate the course of business, because if the Bill were passed in your Lordships' House it would only go to join, like a twin, the Bill of precisely the same character introduced in the other House by Sir J. Lubbock. The point is, that if you pass the Bill in this House it will only go to join its replica in the House of Commons, and you will then have two identical Bills bearing the honoured names of Lubbock and Onslow sent before the Grand Committee, together with the Government Bill and the Bill mentioned by the noble Lord. As regards pressing on the particular Bill in question, I do not think you will achieve any useful object by proceeding further with it now.

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW said, the noble Lord opposite spoke as if he and his friends in the House of Commons were powerless to further the stages of their Bill or give opportunities for the discussion of this Bill. But the Government had taken the whole time of the House of Commons, and could therefore do what they liked with their own Bill or give facilities for the consideration of the other Bills. A better plan would be for all the Bills to be introduced here and remitted to a Committee of their Lordships' House, where the Government would be adequately represented by the noble Lord. With regard to the objection to having two identical Bills, of course if this Bill passed their Lordships' House Sir J. Lubbock would withdraw his Bill. However, he was prepared to accept the suggestion of the noble Lord who had spoken on behalf of the Government, and, if the Bill were read a second time, to postpone its further stages indefinitely.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

BISHOPRIC OF BRISTOL ACT (1884) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 131.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

VISCOUNT CROSS: My Lords, I have to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill. A Bill was passed 10 years ago for the division of the See of Gloucester and Bristol. It has been desired to subsidise the old See of Gloucester, and a considerable sum of money has been forthcoming to carry out that desirable object. It has, however, not been found easy to get all the money wanted, and therefore this Bill has been introduced for the purpose of allowing the £500 a year, which was to be given under the Act of 1884 in the division of the See of Gloucester and Bristol, to be increased to £700 a year. This Bill has the approval of the right rev. Prelate who presides so well over the joint diocese. Something, I think, is to be said quite irrespective of the wish to complete this Bishopric, because it turns out that when the old Palace of Bristol was destroyed in the Bristol Riots a large sum was collected for the purpose of re-building it. I do not know what became of the whole of that sum; at all events, some part of it was devoted to the restoration of the Palace of Gloucester. Therefore, the See of Bristol has some claim upon that sum. I do not suppose there will be any opposition to the Second Reading of this Bill or to its passing.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Viscount Cross.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

NEWTON ABBOT WORKHOUSE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked whether any Report of the proceedings in reference to the conduct of officials in the Union workhouse at Newton Abbot had been received; and, if such Report had been sent in, whether it could be presented to Parliament? He said, their Lordships' attention had been drawn to the proceedings of these workhouse authorities in Devonshire against whom grave charges had been made. He understood that an investigation had taken place, and that a Report would shortly be sent in to the Government. He wished to know whether that Report would be laid before Parliament?

*LORD HAWKESBURY said, that a public inquiry was held by two of the Inspectors of the Local Government Board in consequence of complaints in connection with the management of the workhouse, and, as a result of that inquiry, the Local Government Board required the immediate resignation of the matron. The facts which were disclosed at the inquiry led the Board to direct that the inquiry should be re-opened with a view to holding a full investigation as to the administration of the workhouse generally. A Report of that further inquiry had been received, and was now under the consideration of the Board. The Reports made to the Board by its Inspectors were confidential communications, and, as the President of the Board had stated in the other House, he was not prepared to present the Reports in question to Parliament.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH presumed that the Government intended to take some action upon the Report.

LORD HAWKESBURY thought that would probably be the case.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 28th June 1894.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

THAMES CONSERVANCY BILL

(by Order.)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now considered."

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton), who had the following notices on the Paper :—

"That the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee ;"

and

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to add four additional members to the Board of Conservators as now proposed in the Bill—namely, two representing the Corporation of the City of London and two representing the London County Council ; and, further, to make the constitution of the Board of Conservators, as amended, remain in force until December 31, 1896, unless continued by Act of Parliament beyond that date or altered by Act of Parliament before that date," rose to move that the Bill be re-committed.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) said, it would be very convenient for the House to be informed whether the Motion for the re-committal of the Bill and the proposed Instruction could be taken together.

*MR. SPEAKER said, the Motion for the re-committal of the Bill can be taken because it is down by Order, but it can only be taken without reference to the proposed Instruction, which is not down by Order ; and if there is any objection to the Instruction being taken, it will have to stand over. It can only be taken now by agreement on both sides.

MR. J. STUART said, he was willing to meet the convenience of the House, and was ready to move both the re-committal of the Bill and the Instruction to the Committee or to postpone the matter to the following day. He was in no sense desirous of opposing the Bill.

MR. JACKSON : I understand that ; that course is not practicable. We cannot take both the re-committal and Instruction.

*MR. SPEAKER : What I said was, that as one was down by Order and the other was not, the Instruction cannot be taken to-day if it is objected to. It is scarcely possible to discuss the re-committal without reference to the Instruction.

MR. J. STUART : Perhaps it would be convenient if I stated what I am prepared to do.

SIR F. DIXON - HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge) said, the promoters of the Bill would prefer that the Motion of re-committal should be taken that day, because if the Motion was rejected the proposed Instruction would fall through.

*MR. SPEAKER : The Motion for re-committal is in Order, but the Motion for the proposed Instruction is not in Order, and must stand over unless there is a general consent that it shall be taken. If any technical objection is made, the notice must stand over in accordance with the Standing Orders.

MR. J. STUART said, he was quite willing to go on with one part or to postpone the whole question until a later and convenient day.

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND : We consider it much better that the re-committal should be taken to-day. If the County Council are beaten on that no more will be heard of the Instruction.

MR. J. STUART : It is a rather difficult thing to deal with the two points separately, but I will do the best I can under the circumstances. But am I obliged to move the Motion in my name, seeing it would be obviously for the convenience of the House it should stand over till we can take the Instruction ?

*MR. SPEAKER : The first Motion being by Order that must come on to-day, unless arrangements can be made between the two parties.

MR. J. STUART said, there was nothing left but to move it under the circumstances. He explained that the object the County Council had in view was not to throw out the Bill, but to so amend the constitution of the Conservancy Board as to add to the representation of the metropolis upon it. During the progress of the Bill through Committee changes had been made in a contrary direction to that desired by the Council and those who represented London. At present London was represented on the Board by ten members—seven from the Corporation and three from the County Council; but the present Bill reduced that representation to eight, while 12 members were given to the upper parts of the river. On previous occasions when the Conservancy Board was reconstituted—in 1864 and 1866—the Bills which ultimately became Acts were preceded by an inquiry by Committee; but the Committee on this Bill had been unable—had not been empowered—to make that extended inquiry which he held to be necessary. Taking interest and population into account, it was felt that a larger representation ought to be ensured on the Conservancy Board for the Metropolis, and that the Bill as it now stood could not be accepted by those who represented London as a satisfactory or final solution of the question. The preservation of the Port and Harbour of London was a very important matter. The question of the London water supply was also involved, and the functions of the Conservancy Board had been very widely extended, while on the showing of the Board itself the funds placed at its disposal were, in view of the work it was to do, very inadequate. At any rate, London ought not to be placed in a worse position on the Board than it was now. In order to ensure that proper inquiry might be made into the whole question of the representation on the Board, the County Council desired that a clause should be inserted in the Bill terminating the Conservancy Board at a given date. He repeated that he had no desire to defeat the Bill; on the contrary, he wished it to pass, and if without re-committal it was possible to move the Amendments he had to propose when the Bill again came before the House, he was quite willing to do that in order to save time. His main point was that the Metropolis ought to be more fully represented, and to secure such fuller representation was his sole object.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "now considered," in order to add the words "re-committed to the former Committee."—(Mr. J. Stuart.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'now considered' stand part of the Question."

*MR. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. Member to say he is willing to allow this stage to pass if he can move his Instructions in the form of Amendments on Report.

MR. J. STUART: Yes, I am prepared to do that in order to facilitate the Business of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: What is the view of the opponents of the Instruction? It would be impossible for the Motion for re-committal and the Instruction to be fixed for the same day.

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND: We prefer that this part of the question should be debated to-day, because if the re-committal is defeated we shall hear no more of the Instruction. I should like to know whether, if this state of representation is restored, the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.) said, he was desirous of pointing out the great difficulty in which the House would be placed if they attempted to discuss the Motion for re-commitment without at the same time discussing the questions that arose upon it. He hoped that all difficulties would be got over by some reasonable arrangement on both sides which would enable a settlement to be arrived at without the necessity for spending the time of the House upon it. That might turn out to be the case if the Instruction were withdrawn and the matter allowed to stand over until the hon. Gentleman had put down such Amendments as he desired to move. As he understood, they were at present precluded from discussing the matter on its merits, and he might say he thought it might not be necessary to discuss it at all, so near had the parties arrived at an agreement.

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland) said, he agreed it would be extremely difficult to discuss the questions involved separately, and that it would be a better thing that they should debate the whole matter at one time. He thought, in the meantime, there was a reasonable chance of a settlement being effected, which might save the House the trouble of discussing this matter, and which would satisfy all the parties. He thought a postponement was the best course that could be adopted.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, he had no desire to interfere with a reasonable arrangement, but he wished to point out that the difference between the Instruction of the hon. Member opposite and of his hon. Friend behind him only represented one feature of the question for consideration. There were a number of other matters which would be affected; and if they were going to open up a decision deliberately arrived at by a Committee upstairs after 28 days of laborious and most careful consideration, the House must, in common justice, admit to the re-consideration not only the persons interested in the Instruction of the hon. Member, but also the representatives of all the other interests concerned. In order to enable the House to have within their view the other matters arising out of the Instruction it would be necessary to place an Amendment upon the Paper. For himself and friends he might say that they loyally accepted the conclusions arrived at by the Committee and did not want to re-open any of them; but if an arrangement was proposed that this present discussion should terminate and the matter raised by Amendments dealing with the points at issue, he must protest, in the name of the other persons interested, of the injustice of such a course, for unless they were allowed to put upon the Paper Amendments embodying their views it was impossible that they could be discussed. If such Amendments were put down they must necessarily prolong the discussion. He repeated that, so far as the up-river constituencies went, they were disposed to accept the conclusions of the Committee as they stood.

*MR. BRUNNER (Northwich, Cheshire) said, his suggestion was that, both in the interests of the shipowners and the London County Council, it would be better that the first part of the Motion should be withdrawn. The hon. Gentleman made an observation upon the constitution of the Board when—

MR. W. LONG rose to a point of Order. He said the hon. Gentleman was, as he understood, discussing the merits of the Instruction which had been put down on the Paper. Mr. Speaker, as he took it, had suggested that a discussion of that kind was out of Order.

*MR. SPEAKER: It was not my suggestion, and I should not presume to make any suggestion to the House; but my opinion was asked, and I said the Motion was in Order, although, perhaps, inconvenient. Technically, as I have said, there would be a breach of Order, but it is a very slight one, which I thought might be permitted in this instance. My suggestion is that both the Motion and the Instruction should stand over to another day, until they can both be put down by Order or treated as though they had been put down by Order for the same day.

SIR G. RUSSELL (Berks, Wokingham) said, he should very strongly oppose any alteration of the agreement arrived at by the Committee. Their recommendations were not all that he desired, but he was willing to accept them. If the matter had to be re-opened he should wish to adopt the suggestion of Mr. Speaker, so that the subject whenever it came on should be discussed as a whole.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) said, that as the Chairman of the Committee perhaps the House would allow him to say that he felt they were placed in a very considerable difficulty. It was impossible adequately to discuss or even to answer what the hon. Gentleman opposite had said unless they were prepared to deal with the Instruction to the Committee as well as with the Motion to re-commit the Bill. It was obvious that there were questions underlying the Instruction which were of the greatest importance with regard to the Bill as a whole. He wished to join in the appeal that they should act on the suggestion of Mr. Speaker, that the Motion should be withdrawn and put down for another day, when the whole question could be discussed. This matter raised questions of such great importance, not only with respect to this Bill but with respect to the whole procedure of the House of Commons, that he felt it was better that it should be threshed out in a complete discussion.

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND said, that after the suggestion which Mr. Speaker had been good enough to throw out, and the feeling expressed by the House, he thought it wise to allow the course suggested to be adopted and the Motion to be withdrawn.

*MR. SPEAKER said, in that case the Motion would be withdrawn and the discussion would be attached to the Motion for re-commitment of the Bill.

MR. BRYCE said, he understood that the suggestion of the hon. Member for Shoreditch was that he should prefer to proceed by setting Amendments down to the Motion. He should like to know whether it was competent to proceed in that way supposing that the matter should stand over from that day?

*MR. SPEAKER: In that case the hon. Gentleman might have to ask the House for leave to withdraw, and that leave might not be granted. Of course, if the hon. Gentleman desires it, I will ask the opinion of the House upon the question.

MR. J. STUART: May I not withdraw the present Motion? If an arrangement is come to it will be unnecessary to refer it back to the Committee.

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND: Then I will agree to the postponement until to-morrow. [Cries of "No!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: The matter can be formally postponed until to-morrow, and a date afterwards fixed for the discussion.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

PRIVILEGE.

VACATION OF SEAT ON SUCCESSION TO A PEERAGE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to a question of Privilege of considerable importance. It is not in any sense a Party matter, nor is the Resolution which I intend to propose one of a controversial character. But the matter does raise a question of grave Constitutional importance, and, although it is somewhat technical, I think the House will be glad to have attention called to it. The matter arises out of a Motion which was unanimously adopted by the House on Tuesday with reference to the vacancy in the Attercliffe Division of Sheffield. The Motion was made—

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the election of a Member to serve in the present Parliament in place of the Hon. B. Coleridge, who, since his election, has accepted the office of Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds."

Now, that is a very unusual form in which to move the Writ in such a case. There is, I think, absolutely no precedent for it. But the Motion is usually one entirely formal, and I do not think that the unusual character of it on the present occasion attracted any particular attention. But I want to call attention to what follows from having carried this Resolution. It is based on two propositions. The first of these propositions is that Mr. B. Coleridge was up to his acceptance of office a Member of this House; otherwise, of course, he could not have vacated his seat by accepting office. The second proposition is that at the time of accepting office the Hon. B. Coleridge was not a Peer of the realm. That, of course, is involved in the wording of the Resolution. He was described as the Hon. Bernard Coleridge, the eldest son of a Peer, but not a Peer; but this also follows from the former proposition, because if he was a Member of the House of Commons at the time he accepted office he could not be a Peer at the same time. Consequently, the House by passing this Resolution has indirectly decided that a man may be a Member of Parliament and not a Peer, although he is the eldest son of a Peer who is deceased. I wish to call the attention of the House to the extremely important consequences which follow from this. Why is it, if at all, that the Hon. B. Coleridge was not a Peer at the time he accepted the office of the Chiltern Hundreds? It can only be because he had not fulfilled a certain formality—that is to say, because the Writ of Summons which calls him to the Upper House had not been issued. But the Writ of Summons is only issued on the application of the person who succeeds to the Peerage, and consequently a person who succeeds to any Peerage will have it in his power to refrain from applying for a Writ of Summons, which is as long as he pleases, and during the whole of such time he will be eligible as a Member of this House and may sit in this House. Of course, the House understands I am not saying this is so, but I do say this follows from the Resolution passed on Tuesday. But that is not all. Not only an eldest son, the heir of a Peerage, who now sits in this House, would have a right to continue to sit in this House, but every successor to a Peerage would be eligible as Member of Parliament so long as he had not applied for his Writ of Summons. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, speaking at Rotherham last night, referred to some proposal which had been made for allowing a Peer to choose whether he would be a Peer or a Commoner, and I think he said it would be a most intolerable thing that a person should be able to exhaust the privileges of the House of Commons and then, when tired of the House of Commons, go up to the House of Lords. That is precisely what we have established by the Resolution of Tuesday last. It will be perfectly possible, if that Resolution is sustained, for a man, say, in the position of the Hon. Bernard Coleridge, to refrain just as long as he likes from applying for the Writ of Summons, and during the whole of that period he will be eligible to sit as a Member of this House. It has been suggested that if the Government are in any way responsible for the Resolution in question—which I do not suppose they are more than formerly—then this Government, which is committed to mending or ending the House of Peers, have really hit upon a means of granting to Peers a new and exceptional privilege—a privilege for exhausting all the delights of the House of Commons, and then, in their old age, retiring to the House of Lords, as to a haven of rest. But what has been suggested to me is that, after all, this may be an invidious way of ending the House of Peers, because every successor to a Peerage who has enterprise, energy, and ambition will probably choose the House of Commons during his period of juvenility, and will only seek the House of Lords when he reaches the stage of decrepitude. I think, then, I have shown that the effect of the Resolution of Tuesday will be to bring about enormous Constitutional changes, and, although I myself am not prepared to regard altogether without favour some proposition which would allow the eldest son of a Peer greater choice than at present, still the House will probably agree that no such change ought to be admitted

incidentally into our Constitution or without full consideration. I want now to take the other alternative. Suppose that the Resolution is admitted to be wrong, what have we done in that case? In that case, the House of Commons is in a most embarrassing position. It has been induced to make itself ridiculous by saying the thing that is not. It has been induced to declare a seat vacant for a reason which does not exist, whereas the seat was previously vacant a week ago for a totally different reason. It is perfectly evident things cannot be allowed to remain in their present position, and therefore it is I have thought it desirable to call the particular attention of the House of Commons to the circumstances. If the House will bear with me I will proceed to consider what, after all, is the main question. Was not the Hon. Bernard Coleridge a Peer on Tuesday last before he accepted office, or was he not? I have examined as far as I could—with the assistance which the authorities of the House are always so ready to render—the precedents upon this subject, and I must say they appear to be continuous and consistent. The first one to which I will refer is a dictum of Mr. Speaker Onslow, who was Speaker between 1727 and 1754. I should say that at that time the practice with regard to the vacating of seats by Members called to the Upper House differed materially from our present rule, because in those days it appears to have been the custom, immediately upon the death of a Peer, to move for a new Writ, the seat being held to be vacated thereupon if the heir of the Peer were at the time a Member of the House of Commons. The Writ was moved for—that is to say, without waiting for any proof. And this question having been brought before the House on one occasion, Mr. Speaker Onslow said—

“When a person becomes a Peer by descent, the instant the ancestor dies, the heir becomes a Peer, and his seat in the House of Commons becomes immediately vacant, and there is no necessity to wait for the issue of the Writ to call such heir to the House of Peers, for it is only a Writ of Summons to attend his service there, and without it, and though he should never take his seat there, he is to all intents and purposes whatsoever, a Peer of the realm.”

That was the state of the law and the custom of the Constitution as laid down by Mr. Speaker Onslow. Since Mr.

Speaker Onslow's time, and, I imagine, a little previously to the beginning of the century, a different course prevailed, and it became the habit of the House of Commons to ask for proof that the person who claimed the Peerage was entitled to it, and the best proof of such claim was held to be the issue of the Writ of Summons, of course after examination by the Committee of Privileges of the House of Lords. In 1809 a case arose where General Bertie became Earl of Lindsay, and the Writ having been issued on the death of the Earl of Lindsay, subsequently a writ of supersedeas was moved and carried, because the Writ of Summons had not been issued by the Crown; and the House of Commons, although they had proof of the death of the Peer, had no proof who was really his rightful successor. In 1811 the wisdom of the course which has since been pursued by the House of Commons was, I think, clearly justified, because in that year Lord Dursley claimed the Peerage of the Earldom of Berkeley, and upon his claim a Writ was moved, and a new Member was elected in the place of Lord Dursley. That new Member was Sir William Guy, who sat for the County of Gloucestershire. Subsequently the Peers rejected the claim of Lord Dursley, and the Earl of Berkeley claimed the seat in the House of Commons, so that there were two claimants for the Gloucestershire seat. Subsequently Lord Dursley, or Colonel Berkeley, as he was then called, did sit in the House of Commons again until he became a Peer under another title. But, the House of Commons having been clearly induced into error in that case, I believe I am right in saying that subsequently, without exception, it has always required proof of the rightfulness of the claim by demanding that the Writ of Summons should have been previously issued. There was a case in 1830, when Lord Lovaine became Earl of Devon, where an attempt was made to move the Writ before the Writ of Summons had been issued, and the Mover referred to a previous case—that of Lord Carlisle—where the then Speaker had inquired when the Writ was moved whether the Writ of Summons had also been issued. But, attention having been called to the matter, the Speaker had explained that he had only done so as a matter of curiosity, because the seat in the House of Commons was vacated whether the Writ had been issued or not. I wish to call attention to that. The point is this: that, while the Writ of Summons is evidence as to who is the real successor, the seat is vacated by the death of the predecessor, and the seat becomes vacant immediately upon the death of the predecessor, although the House of Commons does not take cognisance of the fact. On the occasion to which I have referred Mr. Speaker Manners Sutton deprecated the issue of a Writ, and said the House would require special and positive evidence that the Member had become a Peer. That positive proof, he said, was to be found in the Writ of Summons, but if that Writ was delayed other proof might be received. The fact of the issue of the Writ of Summons is not the only evidence that would be conclusive. In 1835 there was a similar case, when Mr. Speaker Abercrombie decided that it would be highly inexpedient to direct the issue of a Writ, and said the only safe and certain evidence was that the Member had received the Writ of Summons. In 1840 there was a very curious case, in which the Writ was moved and granted in the case of Lord Stormont, who had become the Earl of Mansfield, while the late Earl was actually unburied. The reason was that Lord Stormont was a Peer of Scotland as well as of England, and in the Peerage of Scotland there is no Writ of Summons, and the House proceeded on current rumour or general knowledge and did not ask for the special proof of the Writ of Summons. Lastly, there was the case of 1844, where Mr. Scarlett became Lord Abinger, and where the Writ was delayed for a period of three weeks, in order that the Writ of Summons might previously issue. A Member of the House of Commons complained of the delay in the issue of the Writ, and stated that it was a great injustice to the constituency. Thereupon Mr. Speaker Shaw-Lefevre said it was true that when a Peer of the realm died his eldest son ceased to be a Member of the House of Commons; but he explained that the House had no means of knowing whether the claim to the Peerage was bonâ fide, and the only safe course was to wait for the issue of the Writ of Summons before moving for a new Writ. I think the House will see that in all these cases there is one consistent, logical, and plain rule—namely, that the seat in the House of Commons becomes vacant upon the death of the predecessor, but that the House of Commons is justified in not taking notice of the claim until it has been proved either by the Writ of Summons, which is the more convenient and general way, or, failing the Writ of Summons, by some other evidence. The delay of the House of Commons in dealing with the matter must not, however, be held as affecting in the slightest degree the status of the person concerned. That person—that is to say, the heir to the Peerage—is debarred from taking his seat in this House, and his seat has become vacant, whether his claim to the Peerage is admitted or not. I will put a case—an extreme case. Suppose a Peer dies leaving two claimants to the Peerage, A and B. Until it is settled who is the true claimant the whole question is in abeyance. If A and B were both Members of the House of Commons, then if either of them sat or voted in this House he would do so at his own risk and peril, and if either of them afterwards were declared to be the rightful heir his Peerage would date from the death of his predecessor, and if he sat and voted in the House of Commons he would be liable to whatever pains and penalties might attach to that action. The point is—and I will apply it to the case of the Hon. Bernard Coleridge, according to everything that has proceeded from previous Speakers who have dealt with this matter—at the time the Writ was moved and the office of the Chiltern Hundreds was granted to him the Hon. Bernard Coleridge did not exist, but in his place there was Lord Coleridge, the second Baron Coleridge; and Lord Coleridge being unable to sit in the House of Commons, the seat was ipso facto vacant, and it is untrue to infer, as we did by our Motion the other day, that that seat became vacant in consequence of the acceptance of office by the Hon. Bernard Coleridge. I think that is consistent with the position which à priori we should have supposed to be the case. In the first place, the grant of a Peerage is to a man and his male heirs, and as soon as the man dies the heir takes up the title. There is no lapsus, no cessation of continuity. It is just the same in the case of an hereditary title as in the case of a Monarchy:—"The King is dead; long live the King!" The new King takes up the title and obligations on the death of the old King, and in the same way the new Peer is a Peer from the moment of the death of his father or predecessor. I should also add—although it is a small matter—that evidently the view I take of the position is also the view taken by Lord Coleridge himself, because on the day when the office of the Chiltern Hundreds was granted to him under the name of the Hon. Bernard Coleridge, he was writing a letter to his constituents in Sheffield, in which he expressed his deep regret at being forced into the House of Lords, and he signed the letter, "Your grateful friend and servant, COLERIDGE." I deny altogether that it is possible to treat Lord Coleridge as if he were a double-barrelled person. He cannot be Lord Coleridge and the Hon. Bernard Coleridge at the same time. If my precedents are not disturbed, he is, and was upon the death of his father, Lord Coleridge, and, that being the case, it is clear that what we ought to have done was to have waited for the issue of the Writ until the Writ of Summons had been applied for. I assume that the Government would have had some influence with Lord Coleridge to induce him to wait for the issue of the Writ of Summons, and if the Writ were delayed the House would have had full authority to proceed upon other evidence. In no case, I venture to think, is there any precedent under similar circumstances for issuing the Writ before the Writ of Summons had been applied for. I have seen some allusion in the newspapers to a precedent, which it was stated arose in the cases of Lord Russell and Lord Swansea, but I think it will be admitted that the case of a Peer by creation is totally different from that of a Peer by descent. A Peer by creation does not become a Peer until his Patent has passed the Great Seal, and it was competent to give Lord Russell and Lord Swansea the Chiltern Hundreds and vacate their seats, because they remained Members of the House of Commons until the time when the Patent had been passed, but that is not the case in regard to Lord Coleridge. Well, what is it which the Government have done, and what is it the Government have induced the House of Commons to do? In the first place, they have given the Chiltern Hundreds to a Peer. I believe complaint has already been made that the present Cabinet have given too many offices to the hereditary House, and here is another office styled, I believe, "one of profit under the Crown," which has been given to a Member of that House. I admit it is within their right to do that, but then, Sir, what they have done is to give it in the wrong name. They have given it to a person who did not exist, and that is, I think, an irregularity of which the House is entitled to take notice. But, Sir, they have done worse than that. I contend that they have broken the law, and I must call the attention of the House to the Statute which regulates the vacation of seats when office such as that of the Chiltern Hundreds has been conferred. It is the 6th of Anne, chap. 41, section 25, and it provides that—

"If any person, being chosen a Member of the House of Commons, shall accept of any office of profit of the Crown during such time as he shall continue a Member"— these are the words to which I wish to direct attention—

"his election shall be and is hereby declared to be void, and a new Writ shall issue for a new election, as if such person so accepting were naturally dead."

Well, Sir, the Hon. Bernard Coleridge, or Lord Coleridge, did not accept the office during the time he was a Member. He accepted it after he had ceased to be a Member by the death of his father, and consequently this Resolution if not illegal is exceedingly irregular, and I am not quite certain that it would not be held null and void. It is only in the case of a Member during such time as he shall continue to be a Member that the seat can be declared to be void. In my opinion, therefore, our declaration of a seat as void, based on the assumption of office by a man who was not a Member of the House of Commons at the time he accepted office, was absolutely without legal effect. I must also point out that if it were held to be legal there is a proviso to this section which will have a very curious result, because it runs as follows:—"Provided nevertheless that such person"—that is, the person owing to whose selection for office the seat has been declared void—

"shall be capable of being again elected as if his place had not become void as aforesaid."

If, therefore, Lord Coleridge was a Member of the House of Commons at the time he accepted office, and if his acceptance of office vacates the seat, then Lord Coleridge at the present time is under the Statute eligible for a seat in this House. That is the absurdity to which we have been reduced by the undue haste and precipitancy of somebody or other in applying for this Writ for the Attercliffe Division. I would ask, what was the ground for moving in this matter so hastily? Why could not the universal precedent have been followed; why could we not have waited either for the issue of the Writ of Summons or for proper evidence? As far as I understand from the newspapers, the people of Attercliffe are in no particular hurry. They have difficulties and differences of their own to settle, and a little time would have been of great advantage to them. I am totally at a loss to understand what ill-advised person can have decided that it was necessary to hurry this matter forward with such indecent haste. In any case, the House of Commons is in considerable embarrassment and difficulty, and, under the circumstances, I trust that the Government will make no objection to the proposition which I now venture to submit—namely—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the circumstances under which the New Writ for the Attercliffe Division of Sheffield was issued on Tuesday, 26th June, and into the law and practice of this House relating to the Vacation of Seats of Members who succeed to Peerages."

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the circumstances under which the New Writ for the Attercliffe Division of Sheffield was issued on Tuesday, 26th June, and into the law and practice of this House relating to the Vacation of Seats of Members who succeed to Peerages."—(Mr. J. Chamberlain.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I do not rise at all to oppose the Motion which the right hon. Gentleman has made. I think it is a very proper Motion. I think that the House should inquire into this matter and settle the law on the subject. But I must state my entire difference from the right hon.

Gentleman in his view of what has hitherto been regarded as the law of Parliament on this matter. He referred to a conversation—I think it was between Lord Egremont and Mr. Speaker Onslow—which is reported in an early edition of Hatsell, but he did not refer to a correction of that report which absolutely negatives the conclusion he drew. The proposition laid down by the right hon. Gentleman is this : that a man who is, in fact, a successor to a Peerage ceases to be a Member of the House of Commons from the fact that he is such a successor. He referred to a case in which there were two claimants to a Peerage, and said that if one of those claimants had turned out to be in the wrong, and not really entitled to the title—

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I said that the one who was declared ultimately to be the rightful heir would suffer pains and penalties for an act done at a time when his succession was doubtful.

SIR W. HARCOURT : Well, I think the case to which I am going to refer absolutely controverts that proposition. Mr. Hatsell corrected the conversation to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, and laid it down that until the King, by Writ of Summons, called a man up to the House of Peers, that man could not lose his right to sit in the House of Commons. Under the Statute 3 & 4 Geo. III., cap. 26, it is provided that there must be a certificate given by two Members of Parliament stating that a Writ of Summons has been issued under the Great Seal of Great Britain to summon the Peer to Parliament. Why not certify the late Peer's death ? If what the right hon. Gentleman says is correct, and that the death ought to vacate the successor's seat at once, why is this provision made in the Act of Parliament ; why does the Act require that before a Writ is issued for the election of a new Member to this House there should be a declaration that the Writ of Summons has been issued ? If the right hon. Gentleman is right that requisition is totally unnecessary. There are also the words used in the Order of this House for a warrant—namely—

“ To make out a new Writ for the election of a Member for so-and-so in the room of so-and-so, who since his election has been called up to the House of Peers.”

Sir W. Harcourt

Now, why was that rule established ? Because you had no proof that any particular individual was the heir. You must have proof. He has got to prove to the satisfaction of the House of Lords the death of the Peer he claims to succeed ; he must prove the marriage of that Peer, and he must prove that he is the eldest son and the legitimate son of the deceased Peer. Until this is proved the House of Commons has no right to surmise that the man who is a Member of the House of Commons has ceased to be a Member. In my opinion, there is no ground whatever to assume that, until such proof is given, a Member of the House of Commons has lost his seat. The House of Commons assumed in the case of Colonel Berkeley that he had become a Peer. The right hon. Gentleman says the House may place itself in an absurd position in this case by assuming that Mr. Coleridge is not yet a Peer. Well, in Colonel Berkeley's case, the House of Commons chose to make the assumption that a particular person was the eldest son of Lord Dursley, and had succeeded him. Colonel Berkeley was a Member of the House of Commons, and until the House of Commons has some proof that an individual Member returned by a constituency and sitting in this House is a legitimate heir to a Peerage, it has no right to declare the seat vacant on the ground that he has succeeded to a Peerage. That is the principle which has been acted upon in all these cases. I need not refer to all the cases.

“ When it is advisable,” is said in the last edition of Sir Erskine May's book,

“ to issue a Writ without delay in the case of a Member created a Peer, it is doubtful whether the seat be legally vacated until the Member accepts the Chiltern Hundreds or until the Patentis made out.”

Of course, that is not on all-fours with this case, but the rule is the same. You have no right to conclude that an individual has become a Peer by succession until you can prove it. Of course, the best proof you can have is that furnished by the House of Lords. After the death of Lord Coleridge there was no man who could sit in the House of Lords in his place until an investigation had taken place, for the House of Lords would not allow anyone to sit there. It is perfectly true that there are two cases which I think throw some light upon the subject. In the case of Mr. Scarlett succeeding Lord Abinger, Mr. Tufnell, who moved the Writ, said there might be extreme cases in which a person, from unwillingness to take his seat in the House of Peers, might cause the suspension of the Writ for an indefinite time if the practice of waiting for the Writ of Summons were allowed. Yes, but for what period of time? It might be for many years. Take a case like that of the Berkeley Peerage or the great Douglas case. There may be a man who claims to be a Peer, and if you wait until the decision of the question whether he is a Peer or not you will disfranchise his constituency during the whole time the matter is in suspense. I venture to say that what we have to do is to regard the interests of the constituency in this matter. The first object of the House of Commons is that every constituency shall as soon as possible be represented in this House, and everything that delays that representation is a wrong to the constituency. If a man either voluntarily or involuntarily refrains from proving, or in consequence of conflicting claims is unable to prove, his right, such a course would disfranchise his constituency for an indefinite period. In that case Mr. Tufnell said that the House acknowledged him as a Peer by descent, and that on the death of his father the notoriety of the event was sufficient ground for considering that the Writ should be issued. The House of Commons cannot take notoriety as a sufficient ground for acting in refusing a Writ in the case of a man who has legitimately vacated a seat in this House. The Speaker, in the case I am quoting, said—

“It is true that when a Peer of the realm dies his eldest son ceases to be a Member of the House of Commons, but the House has no means of knowing whether a claim made by one of its Members to a Peerage be bonâ fide or not, and therefore the only safe course to adopt is to wait for a Writ of Summons. The House will recollect rather a recent case in which a Member of this House claimed to be a Peer and it afterwards turned out that he was not so.”

Then he said that the House of Commons ought to require some better evidence of the succession of the son on the death of the father than common report. Then there was a case dated in 1830 in which important statements were made, though I do not say by any means that they settled the law. This was a case of a new Writ, moved, I see, by a relation of mine, for North Nottinghamshire, Lord Scarborough's seat. The Speaker, having heard the statement of the hon. Member and the Motion which was submitted to the House, felt himself called upon to declare that, in his opinion, it was highly inexpedient for the House to direct that the Writ should be issued. The only safe and certain evidence which the House could act upon was that the Member had received his Writ of Summons and had been called up to the House of Peers. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who at that time was Mr. Goulburn, said that there was another important point of view in which the Government ought to be consulted. Suppose in the case of a contested Peerage the House of Commons had issued a new Writ, on the allegation of one of its Members that he had succeeded to the title, would not that be very prejudicial to the interests of his opponent? If the applicant did not, after all, establish his claim, he would be deprived of his seat in the House of Commons; and then Mr. Goulburn said that he apprehended that, until the Writ of Summons should be issued, a Member should be entitled to the privileges of a Member of the House of Commons. My right hon. Friend must have overlooked this case.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I quoted the whole of it. I did not quote the words of Mr. Goulburn, but I did say that, if the contention were sustained, the result would be that every man who succeeded to a Peerage would have it in his power to sit on in this House just so long as he liked, and need not apply for a Writ of Summons.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I only wish to point out to the House what is the present state of the law as declared by great authorities. True, there is another man whose authority is worthy of great consideration in a matter such as this—I mean Dr. Lushington. Dr. Lushington concurred in the objections that had been taken to the Motion to issue a new Writ on the allegation that a Member had become a Peer before he had been so declared by the Lords, because he submitted that that would be to prejudice the judgment of that Assembly. Therefore, we should be undertaking, -if we issued the Writ before the Writ of Summons had been given by the House of Lords, to determine that a man was a Member of the House of Peers, and we might, therefore, on our own authority declare a man to be a Peer whom the House of Lords later might declare not to be a Peer. All must admit that a conflict of jurisdiction of that kind would be most inexpedient, if not, indeed, wholly unconstitutional. Then we are at once brought face to face with this point. The right hon. Gentleman says that either we must wait for the Writ of Summons or for some other proof to be given to this House. How is this House going to obtain proof? Are we going to have a Committee of Privilege to examine whether a man has become a Peer or no? We have never adopted that course before, and it would be a most inexpedient precedent to set up. I quite agree that if a man chose not to sue—if I may use the expression—under a Writ of Summons, he might go on disfranchising his constituency for an indefinite time. That would be a great inconvenience and a great wrong also to his constituency. We might, no doubt, defeat such an attempt by instituting an Inquiry of our own. The only other alternative would be for us to wait for the issue of the Writ of Summons. As I said, there are, no doubt, conceivable cases where it might take a very long time, however much the claimant desired to forward matters, for him to prove his case. What, then, has been the course that this House has thought fit to take? I do not say that it is a course very much to be recommended, but it is the one that the House has always taken whenever a doubt of this kind has arisen. Whenever there has been a doubtful case with regard to a man's right to sit in this House, the way of settling the question has always been to bestow the Chiltern Hundreds, about which there is no doubt, and thereby to preserve the rights of representation in this House to his constituency. The right hon. Gentleman says that we were violating the Statute because we gave the Chiltern Hundreds to a Peer who had ceased to be a Member of the House. That is begging the whole question. It has never been proved yet that he is a Peer. What notice to that effect has this House or the Government received? What notice had they upon which it was possible to act? Certainly none that we can act upon, and, therefore, if there be a doubt in the case, you ought assuredly to give the constituency a right to return its Member by a method which, although indirect, is at any rate certain in its operation. Take the case of Mr. Bagwell, who in 1801 took Holy Orders. It being doubtful whether his doing so rendered his seat vacant under the then existing law, he was offered and accepted the Chiltern Hundreds. Why was that? In order that there might not be the delay and trouble of arguing in this House whether his taking Holy Orders vacated his seat. It was a short and ready method by which delay was removed. So again in 1835 Lord Morpeth accepted the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland, and as there was some delay in making out his appointment he accepted the Chiltern Hundreds in order to save time. Then he offered himself for re-election as Chief Secretary, and was re-elected. What is the suggestion made to us? We cannot move the Writ simply on the death of a particular Peer without having official knowledge that a particular Member of this House is the legitimate heir to that Peerage. In the present case we have no such knowledge with regard to the son of the late Lord Coleridge. We must, therefore, acquire that knowledge somehow. We may acquire it through the instrumentality of the House of Peers or through ourselves. But those inquiries may take time. It is even possible to conceive cases in which it would take a long time to pursue these inquiries, and it is therefore far better for us to cut the knot and remove the delay by the grant of the Chiltern Hundreds. It seems to me that this is a course consistent with all the law and practice of Parliament hitherto. The right hon. Gentleman says, What hurry is there? In my opinion, you ought not to delay a single day longer than is necessary in giving a constituency its right of representation. Why are you to hang them up, to wait for the decision of the case? The period may be short or it may be long; and if you have a method put into your hands by which the constituency can return its Member, that is the best course to take. The right hon. Gentleman evidently has a great fear that there may be heirs to Peerages who may be not so anxious to go to the House of Lords as he appears to desire them to be. For my part, I should be very sorry to lose them if they could be properly retained here. But if they do not apply for their Writ of Summons and the House of Commons objects to any procedure of that kind, we may set up a Committee of Privileges here to investigate the question whether they have or have not become entitled to a seat in the House of Lords, although they do not choose to take it up, and so determine the question for ourselves whether that title, although not acted upon, vacates the seat in this House. All these things are open to question, and I do not know that they have ever been decided, although I have stated what I believe to be the Parliamentary law and practice. I quite agree that it is right and reasonable that any doubts that may exist should be ascertained and cleared up by a Committee. But I do lay down that it is the business of this House at as early a moment as possible in a doubtful case to vacate the seat in order to restore the rights of representation to the constituency, and not to have a man who does not attend or vote in this House because he may or may not be subject to penalties. But when this Committee is appointed I hope that it will embrace not only this question, but a question that has been frequently discussed here though never settled, and that is what ought to be the proper form for a Member of this House to resign his seat. Everybody has felt that the subject should be dealt with, but no Government has ever taken this question up. The present system is clearly not a satisfactory one. It is what Sir Drummond Wolff called it—an anomalous system; and I think that it would be a matter of great importance that the Committee should inquire into the question and make recommendations to this House which would regulate the whole method of vacating a seat. Therefore, I do not oppose the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, but would propose that before the Committee is moved for the matter should be postponed for the purpose of considering how the inquiry can have a wider and more useful construction, so as to put the question of vacating seats in the House of Commons on a sound and well-understood basis.

Sir W. Harcourt

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman has done well, I think, in conceding the Committee for which my right hon. Friend has moved, and I am not at all sure that the extension to the Reference he had proposed would be in any respect inadvisable. I feel almost inclined to suggest that, if he is going to make the purview of Reference wider than is necessary to deal with the specific case brought before our notice to-night, it ought to be so extended as to include some inquiry into the most ridiculous and absurd survival of ancient times and different circumstances by which a man on taking Office under the Crown has to resign his seat in this House. The right hon. Gentleman was not content merely to grant a Committee. He thought fit also to argue the case, and I must say that he appears to me not to have listened to the speech of my right hon. Friend—a speech of masterly lucidity, which put the case of the House of Commons and upon which the House of Commons is asked to pronounce. There was not one word in the right hon. Gentleman's speech, from beginning to end, which showed that he had grasped the point aimed at by my right hon. Friend. Not a word fell from him to indicate that what my right hon. Friend had brought before the House was not whether or not the Attercliffe Division should be immediately given the privilege of asking for a new Member, and not whether or what kind of evidence was required before we could take cognizance of the fact that one of our number had become a Peer. The single question to which he called our attention was this—Is a man who succeeds to a Peerage a Peer from the time his predecessor dies, and is he or is he not during that time competent to sit in this House? I boldly say that nine-tenths of the right hon. Gentleman's speech were not addressed to that point at all. He quoted what he called a correction of Speaker Onslow's dictum, but the first correction which he quoted was in the first place not a correction, and in the second place it was not relevant. The right hon. Gentleman also quoted a Statute of George III., which had nothing whatever to do with these points. He also gave opinions with regard to what ought to happen to an heir to a Peerage who was not a lineal heir, and he told us what ought to be done by the Speaker if the House was not sitting, if a vacancy occurred, and so forth, and so on ; but the real question whether a man can sit or vote in this House and represent a constituency at the same time that he is entitled to claim a seat in the House of Lords—that question was never touched on by the right hon. Gentleman until he came to the end of his speech. Nor did he quote an authority on the question except the solitary one of Mr. Goulburn, who has against him Speaker Onslow and Speaker Lefevre, two of the most illustrious of your predecessors in the Chair, Sir, and against him also, I believe, the whole law and practice of Parliament. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman said anything about one example and practice of Parliament which is, I think, conclusive in the matter. Is there a single case in which an heir to a Peerage, after the succession but before the Writ is issued, has voted and spoken in this House ? Can a case be produced, and if not, why not ? Everyone knows that if a man is competent to vote in this House the Whips would be anxious that he should vote and sometimes speak, and the utmost pressure would be put upon him to exercise his right, at all events in one of these capacities. But the fact that no man, knowing himself to be legally entitled to claim a Peerage, has ventured to exercise his right in this House is conclusive proof in my judgment that by the custom and tradition of Parliament he cannot, and that ipso facto he becomes ineligible to take part in our Debates or represent a constituency of the country. The right hon. Gentleman has argued as if our contention was inimical to the interests of the constituencies, and he has laid it down that if we had our way in this matter the unfortunate constituencies would be deprived for an unduly lengthened period of representation. It is exactly the other way. The consequence of the right hon. Gentleman's action is this—that it will deprive constituencies of the right to return Members to this House. His theory was that if a man chooses to delay applying for the necessary Writ of Summons to the House of Lords, so long will a constituency be deprived of any right to elect a new Member ; and, if my interpretation of the law and custom of Parliament be correct, during all that period the Member who is nominally occupying the seat will be incompetent to perform any functions of a Member of this House. I cannot honestly say that I think the right hon. Gentleman's speech has added to our knowledge of the law on this question or has cleared up the mind of any hon. Gentleman. One thing, however, he has done. He has spread joy and satisfaction in the breasts of various heirs to Peerages who would prefer to remain Members of this House than to take a seat elsewhere. Every Member of this House sympathises, I believe, with such a feeling. I think that most hon. Gentlemen really enamoured of the House of Commons regard no misfortune greater than that of being forcibly divorced from its proceedings. But why are we to create an entirely new and privileged class of the community ? A man must be either a Peer and incompetent to sit in this House, or a Commoner and competent to sit in this House. If the dictum of the Chancellor of the Exchequer be correct, if Speaker Onslow and Speaker Lefevre and the whole catena of traditions they represent are wrong, we shall call into existence for the first time in our history a body of gentlemen who may sit in this House as long as they please, and when they do not please to sit any longer they may go of right to the other House. That is an intolerable state of things. I do not see why we should endow those gentlemen with these exceptional and abnormal privileges, and I do not doubt that when the Committee which is to be appointed examines the law and the precedents on this subject they will see that my right hon. Friend is correct when he says that a man ceases to be eligible for any work as a Member of Parliament directly he has succeeded to a Peerage—not from the time when the Writ is issued, but from the time when his predecessor dies. If that be so, then it becomes as clear as daylight that the criticisms of my right hon. Friend on the Motion of Tuesday are absolutely well-founded and amply justified. For some electoral purpose with which I do not wish to quarrel or to inquire into, the Government for the first time have started a precedent which carries us far beyond the electioneering expediency of the Attercliffe Division, and which may be the beginning of a constitutional change of far-reaching import. I, for my part, desire to raise even at this early stage of the discussion my strong protest against it. I will not dwell further on this matter. I have vindicated the point of view from which my right hon. Friend and I are agreed on looking at this matter, and I quite admit that it is impossible for this House thoroughly to thresh out all the statutory proceedings and customs bearing on the point.

*SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): As the Government have accepted the Motion, the discussion has become almost an academic one. Words, however, have been spoken by the Leader of the House which are of great importance, and if allowed to pass uncontradicted might at some future time be quoted just as the words of Mr. Goulburn have been. I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not feel annoyed if I say that I do not think he has given quite sufficient consideration to this question. When the right hon. Gentleman states that until the heir of a Peer applies for his Writ of Summons he has the right to sit and to vote in the House of Commons he must have spoken without consideration and investigation. A Peer has granted to him a Peerage, and by virtue of the grant the status of the heir is controlled. He obtains thereby certain privileges, among which the right to be a Lord of Parliament is only one; but he is a Peer whether he obtains his Writ of Summons or not. According to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, until the Peer succeeding to a Peerage obtains a Writ of Summons, to be set in motion by the new Peer, he acquires the right by not applying for the Writ of Summons to come to the House of Commons and vote until it suits his convenience to apply for it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: My proposition was this: Until the House of Commons had some proper evidence that a man is a Peer it has no right to treat him as having ceased to be a Member of the House, and during the period when it has no evidence whatever that that man is a Peer it has no right to take a course which would make him incapable of sitting in the House of Commons.

SIR H. JAMES: I do not wish to discuss this matter, but I must enter my protest against that proposition. A Peer is disqualified from sitting in this House—[Cries of "If he is a Peer!"] The Chancellor of the Exchequer says it depends on whether he has accepted the Writ of Summons; but I am sure that on reflection he will see that that has nothing to do with the matter. If a Peer came to the House and voted he would be acting wrongly, and if a Statute had been created enacting penalties—which is not the case—such a man would be liable to a penalty, which is exactly contrary to the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman should recollect that the summons to the House of Lords has nothing to do with the question, except as a matter of convenience and proof. Scottish Peers are not Lords of Parliament, and they never receive a Writ of Summons, but they are prohibited from sitting and voting in the House of Commons. Their disqualification cannot depend upon the Writ of Summons, nor do we ask for inquiry to be made in that case. What, then, becomes of the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Will he apply his theory to the heir of a Scotch Peer? As he never receives a Writ of Summons, he might, according to the right hon. Gentleman's theory, suspend the representation of a constituency indefinitely, or vote as a Commoner. It was, in consequence of the practical difficulty of proof in some cases, a very grave and serious question what was the real position of the eldest son of a Peer, but he was certain that whatever his position was it would be found that the statement made by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not be found to represent the law of Parliament upon this subject.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) said, that before the Motion was put he desired to put a question affecting the electors of Attercliffe, who were not represented—whether the Writ which had been erroneously issued—[Ministerial cries of "No, no!"]—or applied for by the Government on Tuesday last, would be withdrawn, pending the inquiry by the proposed Select Committee. He was anxious that this should be done in the interests of the Labour Party in Sheffield, in order that the Labour candidate at Attercliffe might have an opportunity of making the acquaintance of the electors.

SIR W. HARCOURT: No, Sir; I can assure the hon. Member that a Writ rightfully issued will not be withdrawn.

*VISCOUNT WOLMER (Edinburgh, W.) said, there were one or two considerations bearing on the subject to which his right hon. Friend the Member for Bury had not given adequate weight. The right hon. Gentleman had not dealt with the point put by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to how the House of Commons was to know that a certain Member of the House was the successor to a Peerage. It was not sufficient simply to say that the moment a Peer died his successor, if in that House, ceased to be a Member of it. How was the House immediately to know that he was or became a Peer? This was a question of principle independent of that as to whom the Member succeeded in the Peerage. It was not a question of the son succeeding a father, but of a Member of the House becoming a Peer. The same principle applied whether a man succeeded his father or 30th cousin. The point was—How was the House to be cognizant of the fact that a Member, for instance, was the lineal descendant of a cousin 30 times removed? His right hon. Friend the Member for Bury had asked, what would the Chancellor of the Exchequer do in the case of the next eldest son of a Scotch Peer who was a Member of that House when his father died? What did the Chancellor of the Exchequer propose to do at the present moment; because, unless report belied him, there was at this moment in the House of Commons, and supporting the Government, the rightful claimant, if he chose to be so, to a very ancient Scottish Peerage. [Cries of "Name!"] He hoped the hon. Member would excuse him. If he was incorrect, he had no doubt he should be contradicted, but he had always understood that the hon. Baronet the Member for the St. Rollox Division of Glasgow (Sir J. Carmichael) might, if he chose, be at the present moment one of the Peers of Great Britain. If that was so, what became of the principle of his right hon. Friend the Member for Bury? Even if it was not so, it was quite obvious an analogous case might at any time arise. In the case of the gentleman who the other day succeeded to the Barony of Barnard, had he been a Member of this House, what cognisance would this House have had that he had become Baron Barnard, tracing his descent back 160 years, owing to the death of the Duke of Cleveland? He put that point because it was not so simple as it might be thought. But there was another point connected with Irish Peers. Irish Peers were Members of the House of Lords in one of two capacities, either actual sitting Members of that House by the election of their fellow Irish Peers, or by delegation as the electors of those who sat. If they sat there by election or delegation, in neither of those cases could they sit in the House of Commons; but if they did not sit in the House of Lords by delegation or election—i.e., if they were neither elected nor took part in the election as electors, then they could sit in the House of Commons. That also tended to controvert the statement of his right hon. Friend that it was the fact of being a Peer and not a Peer of Parliament that affected the question. He was very glad that the Committee was to be appointed.

*MR. CURZON (Lancashire, Southport) said, that perhaps he might be allowed to say a few words from the point of view of a class of Members who had been more than once alluded to in the Debate, and who were not unlikely at some future time to find themselves in the position at present or recently occupied by Mr. Coleridge—[Cries of "Oh!"—or Lord Coleridge. In common with some of his hon. Friends in a similar position he had bestowed considerable attention on this matter, with a view to ascertain whether there was in existence or capable of being called into existence any machinery by means of which, even after the deaths of the Peers whom they would succeed, they might continue to show their affection for the House of Commons by remaining in its ranks. In this investigation they found themselves confronted by many perplexities and contradictions of precedent and of authority. On the one hand, they had found the authorities which had been quoted by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham and the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition—the authority of Mr. Speaker Ouslow and others, who had taken the line that the gift of Peerage implied an ennobling of blood—that was to say, that the moment a Peer died his successor became a Peer. On the other hand, they had the fact, upon which perhaps hardly sufficient stress had been laid, that until now there was not a single case on record in which a Writ for a vacancy created by the death of a Peer had ever been moved in this House—except upon evidence given—or except upon the assurance being made to the House that the Writ of Summons had been issued by the House of Lords, and had been received by the heir to the Peerage. That rule had only been infringed, he believed, on two occasions, when the House of Commons, finding that they had made a mistake, receded from the position they took up, and practically re-established what was a valuable and an unbroken precedent. What else had they on the same side? They had what he could not help regarding as the most admirable conduct of Her Majesty's Government on the present occasion. The Government had taken a step which, it was contended, was illegal, not in giving the Chiltern Hundreds to Mr. or Lord Coleridge—that was nothing, for he imagined that they had a perfect right to give it, and he had a perfect right to accept it, but in declaring his seat in the House of Commons vacant because of his acceptance to the Chiltern Hundreds, and they had described him on the Order Book of the House of Commons as the "Hon. Bernard Coleridge." If he was "the Hon. Bernard Coleridge" clearly, in the opinion of the Government, he was a Commoner and not a Peer. If he was a Commoner, clearly he was a Member of the House of Commons.

SIR W. HARCOURT: But we do not know.

*MR. CURZON admitted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer professed his ignorance, but still, so far as he went, he indicated his opinion that Lord Coleridge practically remained at present Mr. Bernard Coleridge.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Application was made in the name of Bernard Coleridge. Bernard Coleridge, Member of the House of Commons, applied for the Chiltern Hundreds. I had no reason to believe—I have no sufficient knowledge now—that Bernard Coleridge, then a Member of the House of Commons, is a Peer.

*MR. CURZON said, he was very grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his interpretation, because he made quite clear his (Mr. Curzon's) point—namely, that in the opinion of the Government Mr. Bernard Coleridge, after the death of his father, remained, and was described on the books of the House as, "Bernard Coleridge."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not know that Lord Coleridge was his father.

*MR. CURZON said, he might further support what he was saying by the words actually used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his earlier speech, in which he indicated that in his opinion a Member of the House of Commons might be treated as a Member of the House of Commons after he had succeeded his father.

SIR W. HARCOURT: No, I did not say that. I offered no opinion on that subject.

*MR. CURZON said, the right hon. Gentleman had stated that until evidence was offered, this House had no right to vacate the seat on the ground that one of its Members was a Peer. That was a point that they were anxious to see settled. He would welcome as much as anybody in the House the Committee which it was proposed to appoint, and in the meantime he thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer very much for the valuable consolation he had afforded them.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: After the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he would accept the Committee, but would desire to extend the Reference, it appears to me that probably the most convenient form of procedure would be that I should now withdraw this Resolution, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on behalf of the Government, should bring up another Resolution with an extended Reference at a later day. But if that is to be the case, I must ask the right hon. Gentleman for a further understanding, which I think he will be willing to come to. The matter now raised concerns particularly the constituency of Attercliffe. It arises directly out of the Motion for the issue of the Writ for that constituency, and in my opinion, taking it for what it is worth, it may be that the decision of the Committee will tend to show that the issue of the Writ was irregular, and that may have an effect on the validity of the election, which may, and probably would, come before the Courts of Law. I am only stating what is possible. What I ask in these circumstances is, if the Reference is to be extended to deal with much more than the present case, that the right hon. Gentleman will be willing to undertake that it be an Instruction to the Committee that they should report first upon this question arising out of the Attercliffe case.

SIR W. HARCOURT was understood to say: I think I must leave that to the Committee. I cannot entertain for a moment the idea that the issue of the Writ is illegal. According to the right hon. Gentleman himself, the seat was vacated before the Chiltern Hundreds were granted and the moment the late Lord Coleridge died. The right hon. Gentleman's objection was to the statement of the ground of the vacation, and therefore I take it the Writ was properly issued. Under these circumstances, no such question as that indicated by the right hon. Gentleman arises.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The right hon. Gentleman will do me the justice to say that I am not insisting that any question will arise. I only ask that this point—the immediate point which I have raised—and the point which alone has justified the Motion for Privilege—should be reported upon first. If the right hon. Gentleman declines to do that I must take a Division on my original proposal.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not do that. I should be extremely glad to confer with him as to the form of the Motion for a Committee, and I will consider what should be done with regard to an Interim Report.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I accept that statement, and ask leave to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

QUESTIONS.

THE NEW LOCAL AUTHORITIES.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Rules for the guidance of Local Authorities, which are required by "The Local Government Act, 1894," will be ready and presented to the House?

Mr. J. Chamberlain

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): The Regulations as to elections are now being prepared and will be issued in full time for their consideration by County Councils, and those on whom duties will devolve in connection with the elections; but I cannot at present state more precisely on what date they will be issued.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON OPIUM.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India when the remainder of the Evidence given before the Royal Commission may be expected to be laid before the House?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (MR. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): Volumes II. and III. of the Evidence taken by the Royal Commission on Opium were laid on the Table on the 25th of May and the 7th of June, respectively, and were distributed yesterday. A further volume will complete the Evidence, and will, I understand, be ready for presentation about the middle of July.

THE COLONIES AND THE DEFENCE OF THE EMPIRE.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can inform the House how many armed vessels and cruisers, and how many Regular troops, Militia, Volunteers, and Armed Police the self-governing Colonies have in readiness on mobilisation for the local defence of the Empire; what has been the capital expenditure in the purchase of such vessels, in the erection and armament of fortifications and the preparation of submarine mines, in the arming of troops, and the erection of military schools; and what is the annual cost of the maintenance of such defences, and of the pay, equipment, education, and training of officers and men?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): It would be highly inexpedient to supply the information sought.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : Am I to understand that the information is not in the possession of the Colonial Office?

MR. S. BUXTON : We have the information, but we think it inexpedient to make it public.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : On what grounds is it inexpedient to give with regard to the colonies information which has been given with regard to the Mother Country and Foreign Powers?

MR. S. BUXTON : It is inexpedient from a national defence point of view to give the information in the form in which the hon. Gentleman asks for it.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : Is it a fact that the self-governing colonies contribute upwards of £3,000,000 sterling a year towards the defensive forces of the Empire?

[No answer was given.]

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT : I must press for an answer to that question.

MR. S. BUXTON : Notice.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) : Cannot the hon. Gentleman answer the second part of the question as to the capital expenditure on the purchase of the vessels? There can be no objection to answering that.

MR. S. BUXTON : There is no objection to giving that information, but I must have time to get it.

STOKERS IN THE ROYAL NAVY.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, in consequence of the scarcity of stokers in the Royal Navy, the Steam Reserve authorities in some of the naval ports have appointed petty officers for recruiting duties; and whether the Admiralty have decided, as an inducement to recruits, to concede the 2d. per day re-engagement money to all stokers and progressive pay to petty officers, so long asked for by these men and as now given to those of the executive branch?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe) : It is not the case that petty officers have been appointed at the naval ports for the purpose of recruiting stokers for the Royal Navy. Neither is it the case that the Admiralty have decided to make any alteration in the terms held out to men who are invited to join the Service in this capacity. Recruiting for stokers is going on to the entire satisfaction of the Admiralty without any extra inducements to enter the Navy being held out.

ADMIRALTY CONTRACTS AND TRADES UNION WAGES.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that the engineering firms of Messrs. Maudslay and Son, Messrs. Humphrey and Tennant, and Messrs. John Penn and Sons, at present engaged on Government work, are not paying the Trade Union rate of wages recognised in the district to their pattern makers; whether he has called the attention of at least one of these firms to the fact; and whether, under these circumstances, the continuance of these firms on the list of Government contractors is in harmony with the Resolution of the House of Commons of the 18th of February, 1891?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : Complaints have been received by the Admiralty from the United Pattern Makers' Association that two of these three firms of Admiralty contractors do not comply with the Resolution of the House of Commons of the 18th of February, 1891. That Resolution, however, said nothing about "the Trade Union rate," but laid it down as the duty of the Government "to make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen."

The two firms in question assert that they do pay the current rate for competent pattern makers; and the counter-statements thus made to the Admiralty are now under consideration.

THE SOUTH WALES COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. WOODS (Lancashire, S.E., Ince) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the shaft where the unfortunate explosion occurred in South Wales, on Saturday last, is only 10 feet in diameter; whether such an area is in accordance with the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, or sufficient for adequate ventilation in a mine 580 yards deep and employing 1,600 men and boys; and whether the Home Office will send some competent person down to watch the inquiry on behalf of the Crown?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I am informed by the Inspector of Mines that in the Albion Colliery the downcast and upcast shafts are each of 19ft. diameter; that the mine is adequately ventilated by 225,000 cubic feet of air per minute; that there is not a larger pair of shafts in the South Wales district. I propose to employ counsel to watch the proceedings on behalf of the Government at the coroner's inquest.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN asked why the Report, which reached the hands of Members on the 12th February last, did not reach the Home Office until May?

MR. ASQUITH: Perhaps my hon. Friend will show me the Report, and I will make inquiries about it.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN: It is on the Pink Paper.

HOURS OF LABOUR ON THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE (West Ham, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that a platelayer named William C. Bartrop was on duty on the Great Eastern Railway on the 29th of April from 6 a.m. till 5.30 p.m.; that he was asked to return to duty at 9 p.m. the same night; that next morning on going to work at 6 o'clock, he was informed by the foreman that he would not be allowed to start until he had seen the Inspector, who informed him that he would not keep men who would not do extra night duty; and that Bartrop was thereupon dismissed for refusing to work overtime; whether this constitutes a breach of the Railway Servants (Hours of Labour) Act; and what steps the Board of Trade intend taking to prevent a recurrence?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The Great Eastern Railway Company inform me that they have made full inquiry into the case referred to, and that it appears — (1) that the failure of Bartrop to put in an appearance on the night in question was not a solitary instance of the kind; (2) that his general time-keeping for some weeks previously had been irregular; (3) that although he had casually complained to the district engineer of having been discharged, and had been invited to attend an inquiry into the complaint, he failed to attend; (4) that he had not complained to the chief engineer of the Company, in whose department he was, although that gentleman is always ready to hear and investigate any grievance the men under him may consider they have. The Company will be asked under the provisions of the Act for a Schedule of the hours of work of persons employed under similar circumstances in the particular district. It would be premature to state till this Schedule has been received what further steps the Board of Trade will take in the matter. Assuming the facts to be as stated in the question, the hours of work required appear to me to be inordinately long.

ALLEGED BRAZILIAN OUTRAGE ON A BRITISH SUBJECT.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Secretary of State will inquire into an alleged outrage committed upon a British subject, named John Carnell, at Curityba, in Parana State, by the Brazilian Military Authorities, who are reported to have seized him, and bound him hand and foot, and carried him off from his wife and family for service in the Army in spite of his protest that he was an English subject; whether, on the wife writing to complain to the Consul at Rio de Janeiro, her letter was opened and not allowed to leave Curityba; and whether the Secretary of State will take the necessary steps to obtain the release of John Carnell, and compensation for such ill-treatment?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): No information with regard to this case has been received, but Her Majesty's Minister at Rio de Janeiro has been instructed by telegraph to inquire into the matter and to report as to the facts.

IRISH HIGH SHERIFFS.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the difficulty of procuring gentlemen in Ireland to accept the office of High Sheriff; and whether he will consider the advisability of bringing in a Bill to relieve those who are liable to selection for this office from the obligations and expenses connected with it, and transferring the duties hitherto performed by the High Sheriff to some Government Department?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : My attention has been called to the matters mentioned in the question. I think it would be premature to propose legislation on the subject until the Select Committee appointed by the House of Lords to consider the question have furnished their Report.

MR. CARSON : Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake not to institute prosecutions against gentlemen who refuse the office?

MR. J. MORLEY : So long as the law is what it is it must be enforced. I should have thought that would have been the view of a member of the Party of law and order.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) : Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire whether the expenses of the office cannot be reduced?

MR. J. MORLEY : I have thought a good deal about this matter, and will consider whether anything can be done in that direction.

THE METROPOLITAN RAILWAY.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the fact that the Metropolitan Railway Company state (in their Report of the 11th current to the Board of Trade) that they have experimented from time to time with fans and other mechanical appliances, but without success, he will state where and in what manner such fans and mechanical appliances were applied for the purpose of removing the foul and poisonous atmosphere of the tunnel sections; and whether, in view of the fact that the experiments to improve the ventilation of the tunnels have failed, any further scheme is in contemplation?

MR. BRYCE : The Board of Trade asked the Metropolitan Railway Company for this information, and I shall be happy to let my hon. Friend see the reply which I have just received. My hon. Friend has already been informed that it is a matter over which the Board have no jurisdiction.

IRISH SCHOOL TEACHERS AND THE EDUCATION ACT, 1892.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it has been brought to his notice that as a result of the Education Act of 1892 the teachers of the best schools in Ireland have suffered a serious diminution in their incomes, the capitation grant being much less than the school fees previously paid; and, if this is the case, will he consider whether in the amending Act now before the House a remedy for this grievance can be introduced?

MR. J. MORLEY : No such case as is referred to in the question has been brought to my notice or that of the Commissioners of National Education. The school fees for 1893 represent a reduction of about £88,000 as compared with 1891, the year before the new Act. But, on the other hand, the gain resulting to the teachers from the Act, in class salaries and in capitation—both of which forms of increase were in compensation for the reduction or abolition of the school pence—was £210,000 (annual school grant provided by the Act), or a net increase for 1893 of £122,000.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : As the Commissioners of Education say that they have not had the matter before them, will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to inquire into the statements contained in a letter which I have in my hands, from which it appears the Commissioners acknowledged the receipt of an inquiry on this very subject from one of the principal teachers in Belfast, and said they could not apply a remedy?

MR. J. MORLEY : I will make further inquiries.

MR. CARSON : Can the right hon. Gentleman state when the Education Act Amendment Bill will be taken?

MR. J. MORLEY : I cannot say at present.

DINGLE PIER.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the recent Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, in which it is stated that the pier at Dingle, in County Kerry, should be extended into deeper water, so that the boats engaged in the mackerel fishing could land their fish at Dingle, and thus obtain the advantage of railway transport; and if he will have inquiry made as to whether there is any way of giving effect to the recommendation of the Fishery Inspectors?

MR. J. MORLEY: The statement referred to in the question of the hon. Baronet expresses the opinion not of the Inspector of Fisheries, but of the local officer of Coastguards. I may state, however, that the question of the extension of the pier at Dingle will shortly be considered by the Congested Districts Board in connection with a proposal to construct a pier at Ballymore a few miles distant.

BALLYMENA UNION.

MR. E. M'HUGH (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has seen a report in The Ballymena Weekly Telegraph of the 26th of May, 1894, containing a report of the proceedings of the Ballymena Board of Guardians, in which it is stated that Mr. R. N. Wilson, of the Belfast Union, took stock in the Ballymena Workhouse stores at the request of the Ballymena Guardians, and to arrange matters so that the new master might take up what was called a clean leaf; whether he has seen the Report which Mr. Wilson presented, dated 11th May, 1894, on the state of the workhouse; is he aware that, after hearing the Report read, Mr. Houston, one of the Guardians, moved that the deficiencies be written off, in order to give the new master a clean sheet; that on the following Board day Mr. Black, J.P., one of the Guardians, handed in a notice of motion for that day fortnight for a sworn inquiry; and that, finding his notice of motion was not in order, Mr. Black handed in a notice of motion to have the resolution rescinded, and that the chairman refused to receive it; and will he state what action the Local Government Board proposes to take in reference to this matter?

MR. J. MORLEY: The facts are generally as stated in the question. The matter has already formed the subject of an inquiry on oath by the Local Government Board, who called upon the Guardians to reprimand several of the officers concerned. It was necessary for the newly-appointed master of the workhouse to be placed in a proper position on taking office, and as the auditor's attention had been called to the deficiencies, no object would, I understand, have been served by the consideration of Mr. Black's motion. The question of the liability of the late master and his sureties for the deficiencies will be dealt with by the auditor at his next audit of the accounts of the Union.

EVICTION IN COUNTY ARMAGH.

MR. E. M'HUGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that an eviction has been carried out in Ballintemple, County Armagh, by the Church Temporalities Commission a few weeks ago; and that there has been no case of agrarian crime, boycotting, or intimidation in this district; why, under the circumstances, a posse of police leave Newry daily, at considerable expense, on a hired car, to guard two emergency men on the same evicted farm; and whether any extra cost will be levied on the district in consequence of this extra force?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that two constables only are engaged on this duty. There has been no case of agrarian crime, boycotting, or intimidation in the district, but at the same time the Local Authorities are of opinion that it is necessary to afford protection to these caretakers. The arrangement will entail no expense whatever to the district.

LICENSED RESTAURANT FACILITIES AT NIGHT, IN DUBLIN.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, E.): In the absence of the hon. Member for the College Green Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that no licensed restaurant accommodation for those wishing to procure supper after the theatres close, and for those engaged on the Press at night, exists in Dublin, although such licensed restaurant facilities both for theatre-goers and for members of the Press exist in several places in London; whether he is aware that the absence of such facilities in Dublin occasions much inconvenience to theatre-goers and members of the Press, and is much complained of; and whether, if application be made to the proper authorities in Dublin by properly qualified persons for permission to provide in properly chosen localities facilities for obtaining supper and other refreshments after the usual closing hours for licensed premises, he will instruct the Police Authorities not to oppose the granting of a limited number of such licences under proper restrictions as to premises, hours, locality, &c.?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have received a Report from the Commissioners of Dublin Police on this question, but it is not sufficiently detailed to enable me to give a reply to-day. Further information has been called for, and if the hon. Gentleman will repeat the question I shall then be in a position to reply.

COLONEL NOLAN: Till when?

MR. J. MORLEY: On Monday.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I shall, when the question is again put, ask whether these exemptions are not regulated by Statute, and whether the right hon. Gentleman has power to go behind the Statutes?

EVICTON OF TENANT PURCHASER, COUNTY KERRY.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, about the 4th of March last, Mr. Thomas Allman, Rahoneen, Ardfert, County Kerry, who purchased his holding in 1888 under the Ashbourne Act, was served with a writ, without any warning or request for payment, at the instance of the Land Commission for £60, £40 of which was the amount of the instalment accruing last November; whether he is aware that, after the service of the writ, Mr. Allman remitted £40, the receipt of which was not acknowledged; that about the 18th of April Mr. Allman wrote inquiring if his cheque had been received, and undertaking to pay the balance due about the middle of May, to which the Commission replied, acknowledging receipt of the £40 and stating that a receipt in full would be issued when the balance was paid; whether he is also aware that, without further notice and before the time at which Mr. Allman had promised to pay the balance, the Land Commission marked judgment for £60, including the £40 paid in March, seized Mr. Allman's cattle, and put him to costs amounting to £7 3s. 6d.; whether this is the usual way of dealing with tenant-purchasers; and whether similar rigour is directed to the collection of tithe rent-charges and other debts due by landlords?

MR. J. MORLEY: The annuity payable in respect of this holding is £80. The Land Commissioners inform me that in August, 1892, it was necessary to institute legal proceedings for the recovery of the instalment due the 1st May, 1892. The amount was then paid and the defendant was forgiven all costs. Mr. Allman paid £20 on account of the £40, the instalment due on the 1st May, 1893, and was given time to pay the balance. Not having paid such balance, and a further instalment of £40 having become due on the 1st November, 1893, he was sued for £60, and on the 8th March, 1894, a letter was written by the solicitor of the Commission to Mr. Allman stating that if he paid £40 forthwith and the balance on the 15th of April, with £1 on account of costs, proceedings would be stayed, but that otherwise they would be continued. The sum of £40 was thereupon paid and was immediately acknowledged. Mr. Allman did not specify in his correspondence any day on which he would pay the balance of £20 so due, nor did he ask for any longer time than the 15th of April last. Accordingly on the 21st of April—namely, one week after the time given for payment—judgment was marked for £20 (not for £60 as stated in the question), and that amount with the statutory costs of the proceedings, amounting to £4 16s., was recovered through the Sheriff. (2.) The Commissioners consider it their duty to require the prompt payment of instalments from those who have purchased their holdings under the Purchase Acts by means of State advances and, as in the present case, when necessary to enforce such payment by legal proceedings. (3.) The payment of tithe rent-charge is also, I am informed, enforced by legal proceedings whenever necessary.

MR. SEXTON asked if the right hon. Gentleman was aware that cases had occurred in which long arrears had been wiped off, and whether it would not be more reasonable, if payments on account were accepted, not to proceed to final judgment without further notice to the tenant?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have no power over the Land Commission in respect of these matters.

THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND (Greenock): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it has been decided to reduce the military contribution payable by the Straits Settlements, in consequence of the great and continuous loss of revenue sustained by these colonies in recent years?

MR. S. BUXTON: I very much regret that I cannot yet state the conclusion to which the Government have come in regard to the Straits military contribution. I trust that the decision can soon be announced.

IRISH OFFICIALS AND PRIVATE WORK.

MR. W. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): On behalf of the hon. Member for the College Green Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. William Turner, Petty Sessions clerk and relieving officer, Clones, County Monaghan, has recently been appointed land agent to Mr. John Madden, Hilton Park, Clones, who has also property near Mohill, County Leitrim; and that much inconvenience has been occasioned to those having business with Mr. Turner as Petty Sessions clerk, and those requiring his services as relieving officer, through his frequent absences from his district on the business of his agency; whether on or about the 17th of May last a complaint was addressed by a man named Clukin to the Registrar of Petty Sessions, Dublin Castle, bringing under his notice the fact that he (Clukin) had suffered much inconvenience through the absence on the 14th and 15th of May ultimo of Mr. Turner in Mohill, collecting rents on the Leitrim portion of Mr. Madden's estates; and, if so, what notice, if any, was taken of the said complaint; whether he is aware that, on the said 14th of May ultimo, several poor persons requiring relief or admission to the workhouse were unable to obtain either, owing to Mr. Turner's absence, as above stated; and whether it is in conformity with the Regulations that a Petty Sessions clerk should also occupy the position of agent to an estate in the district, in which capacity it might be frequently his duty to take legal proceedings before the tribunal of which he is the permanent official?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that Mr. Turner, who holds the offices of Petty Sessions clerk and relieving officer, was appointed in December last to the land agency of the property referred to. Only a portion of this property is situated in the Petty Sessional District, and the clerk states he has never brought a case into the Court from the property since his appointment to the agency. With regard to the discharge by Mr. Turner of the duties of relieving officer, I am informed that on the 14th of May, one of the dates mentioned in the question, four persons were admitted to the workhouse on his orders, and that no complaints have been made to the Guardians against this officer, who, it is stated, discharges his duties under the Poor Law in a satisfactory manner. The letter referred to in the second paragraph preferred a complaint against Mr. Turner in his capacity of Commissioner of Affidavits, and I am causing further inquiry to be made into this matter.

METROPOLITAN COUNTERMEN AND TELEGRAPHISTS.

MR. BUTCHER (York): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will shortly be in a position to send a reply to the Memorial of the countermen and telegraphists of the Metropolitan district of the 28th of February, 1893, with reference to the question of holidays?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): This is one of the two matters to which I referred in my reply to the hon. Member on the 9th of April last. One of these matters has been decided, and the decision communicated to the persons concerned. The other I hope to be able to decide shortly.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF SCIENCE, DUBLIN.

MR. FIELD : On behalf of the hon. Member for the College Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he can state what was the result of the inquiry held by Captain Abney into certain charges against Professor Lyon, Professor of Engineering in the College, set forth in a Memorial addressed last February to the Science and Art Department by the students of the Royal College of Science, Dublin, and what action has been taken, or is intended to be taken, by the Department in reference thereto; whether due notice was given to the students making the complaints of the intention to hold the inquiry; whether the complaints referred to were of the nature of charges of incompetence on the part of the Professor in certain departments of his work, and of negligence in the discharge of his duties as lecturer; whether, at the inquiry, official evidence was produced as to the dates on which it was alleged the Professor failed to lecture; whether he is aware that, owing to the alleged incapacity and negligence of said Professor, several students of the College have left, and others have abandoned the engineering courses; whether he can state at whose instance Professor Lyon was appointed, and what were the qualifications on the strength of which he was considered fit for the position; whether he is aware that certain of the College accounts have been allowed to get into an unsatisfactory condition; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Papers relating to the inquiry and the Report thereon, and also a Return to date of the affairs of the College similar to those published in 1873 and 1878?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) : The answer to the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of the question, and also to the last part of the fifth paragraph, is in the affirmative. As regards the first part of the fifth paragraph, I have no information. Professor Lyon was appointed by my predecessor in Office on his testimonials, which were very good. I have no knowledge of any College accounts having been allowed to get into an unsatisfactory condition. I do not think it would be in the public interest to lay the Papers relating to the inquiry and the Report thereon on the Table of the House. As regards the first paragraph of the question, I have only to say that much that has taken place on the part both of the Professor and of some of the students is far from satisfactory. I may perhaps express the hope that the hon. Member will not press me further at the present time. I can assure him that this matter, involving some delicate questions of discipline, is at present, and has been for some time, engaging my most serious attention.

SOLDIERS AT CATHOLIC CEREMONIES IN INDIA.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to reports in the Madras papers of the 8th of February, in which it is stated that, on the occasion of the Golden Jubilee of Archbishop Colgan, High Mass was celebrated at the Roman Catholic Cathedral; that a guard of honour, consisting of 12 men of the Cheshire Regiment, formed up at the Communion Rails, under the command of Lieutenant Young; that, at the Elevation, the guard of honour presented arms, while the band of the 27th Regiment played the General Salute; and whether the appointment of such guard of honour and presentation of arms by military at such services was regular; and, if not, whether such practices have been prohibited for the future by the Commander-in-Chief in India?

MR. H. H. FOWLER : The matter referred to in the hon. Member's question was brought to my notice in March last, and I accordingly called for a Report from the Government of Madras on the circumstances complained of. That Report has not yet reached me, but I have ascertained by telegraph that the facts are as stated, except as to the officer commanding the Guard of Honour, who was not a lieutenant but a non-commissioned officer. The Guard was composed entirely of Roman Catholics. I am advised that the proceedings were irregular, but until I receive the Despatch from the Government of Madras I am unable to give any further reply.

MR. W. JOHNSTON : What decision has the Commander-in-Chief in India come to on the subject?

MR. H. H. FOWLER : I cannot say until I have received the Despatch.

THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS IN INDIA.

MR. W. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to a statement in The Indian Spectator for the 27th of May, that news is telegraphed from Simla that the Government of India agrees with the Secretary of State in thinking that something like a revival of the Contagious Diseases Acts is necessary ; whether it is the case that either he or the Government of India entertain the intentions here ascribed to them ; whether it is the fact that the Indian Government is now engaged in passing a Bill to make such a system impossible in future ; and how soon he expects that Bill to become law ?

MR. H. H. FOWLER : I have seen the statement in The Indian Spectator to which my hon. Friend refers, and for which there is no foundation. I informed my right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax some weeks ago, in reply to a question in this House, that Lord Kimberley, in a Despatch dated the 1st of March last, had informed the Government of India that in his opinion the only effective method of preventing a recurrence of any practices inconsistent with their orders and with the Resolutions passed by the House of Commons on the 5th of June, 1888, was to proceed by means of legislation ; that he had requested them accordingly to undertake the necessary legislation as soon as possible, and indicated the form in which he wished this to be effected, and that further, to avoid the possibility of any future misconception of orders, he had requested the Government of India to issue a Resolution explaining the policy of that legislation, and prohibiting all practices, as distinguished from Rules or Regulations, inconsistent with that policy.

ROOT CROPS IN IRELAND.

MR. FIELD : On behalf of the hon. Member for the College Green Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will inquire into the fact that throughout extensive districts in Ireland the crops, especially mangel-wurzels, have missed to a great extent this year owing, as alleged, to dead seed having been supplied to the farmers ; whether any inquiry can be instituted as to the sources from whence the retail dealers obtain their supplies ; whether it is the custom to mix old with new seed either in the wholesale or retail houses ; and whether arrangements could be made, before seeding time arrives, to test seeds by getting samples from various quarters and ascertaining by experiment whether they would germinate or not ?

MR. J. MORLEY : This question was only placed on the Paper this morning for the first time, and I must ask the hon. Gentleman, therefore, to be good enough to defer it for some days, in order to admit of inquiry being made.

IRISH STONE FOR IRISH BUILDINGS.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) : I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office, will he explain why dressings of Mount Charles, County Donegal, freestone are not used in the works now going on at the Curragh Camp ; has it given satisfaction in previous works at the camp ; for instance, in the new hospital ; is he aware that Mount Charles freestone was specially selected, to the rejection of all others, for dressing the new Dublin National Museum ; on what grounds are all the dressings at present taken from County Wicklow ; and will Mount Charles freestone be scheduled for the works that are yet to be tendered for ?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hanley) : In the work in which it has been used the Mount Charles freestone is believed to have given satisfaction, and in the event of further freestone dressings being required at the Curragh it would probably be specified in the contract that they should be of Mount Charles stone, or of stone equally good in quality, of texture, and colour. In the buildings now being erected at the Curragh granite has been considered preferable to freestone. It is specified as Carlow granite, or granite of equal quality.

MR. MAC NEILL : As the Government contemplate carrying out extensive works at Loch Swilly and elsewhere, will the hon. gentleman consider the advisability of arranging for the use of this stone ?

MR. WOODALL : That matter has already been considered. We hope that a suitable stone will be found in the immediate neighbourhood of the works.

ATHERINGTON NATIONAL SCHOOL,
NORTH DEVON.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether a demand has been made by the Department upon Atherington National School, North Devon, that a new doorway should be made leading to the girls' offices ; whether the offices of the boys and girls already have separate entrances which lead to the open air, although the children have to use the same door from the open air into the school ; whether the doorway proposed by the Department will not only be an additional expense, but, leading as it would do almost directly from the classroom into the offices, will be both inconvenient and insanitary ; and whether the demand will be reconsidered ?

MR. ACLAND : There is no separate approach, though no doubt there are separate entrances for the two sexes to the offices of this school. The managers were informed last October that this defect should be remedied. The managers did not see how this was to be done, and on receiving a plan of the school a suggestion was made by the Department that a new door might be the best way of meeting the difficulty. The managers, in a letter which is now under consideration, point out objections to this plan, but do not submit any alternative. There has been no demand for a new doorway. It was only a suggestion ; but the defect must be remedied, as the present state of things is inconsistent with what is decent and desirable.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE : Is it not a fact that there are two separate approaches, and that, technically speaking, the two streams of children only merge into one when they enter the school ?

MR. ACLAND : I understand that there is no separate approach, and I do not think the noble Lord or anybody else would desire such a state of things to continue.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE : I have seen the plan, and I think it is as I say. Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to force this new doorway on the school ? I think it is obviously unnecessary.

MR. ACLAND : I said our desire was to secure absolutely separate approaches for boys and girls.

NONCONFORMITY IN WALES.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many parishes in Wales there is no resident Nonconformist minister ?

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint, &c.) asked whether it was not the case that in Welsh parishes which contained no resident Nonconformist minister the spiritual welfare of the people was more efficiently attended to by unpaid Nonconformist deacons than by the paid Established clergy ?

MR. ASQUITH : That is a question as to which I should hesitate to pronounce a judgment. As to the question of the noble Lord, I have no materials in my possession nor means of getting any information which would enable me to answer this question.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE : Would it be an exaggeration to say that in half the parishes in Wales there is no resident Nonconformist minister ?

MR. ASQUITH : I believe it would be a great exaggeration.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE : Is it the fact that the Government have made no inquiry whatever as to the spiritual provision in Wales, when they are at the same time proposing to cripple existing organisations ?

[The question was not answered.]

THE WELSH CATHEDRALS.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, under Clause 7 of the Established Church (Wales) Bill, the Commissioners would have power to alter the structural arrangements and ornamentation of the Welsh cathedrals ?

MR. ASQUITH : No, Sir. The powers of the Commissioners are limited to maintenance and repair.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge) : What does the right hon. Gentleman mean by repair ?

MR. ASQUITH : That is a question which the hon. Member is as capable of answering as I am.

MR. GRIFFITH - BOSCAWEN : Could the Commissioners move the Communion Table to the west end of a cathedral ?

[No answer was given.]

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) : May I ask the Secretary for Scotland as to the control of Cathedral Churches in that country ?

MR. SPEAKER : Order, order ! That question cannot be interpolated at this juncture.

WEST LONDON DISTRICT SCHOOLS.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the West London District School at Ashford, Middlesex, contains 800 children, and is now so full that further accommodation is required ; whether he is aware that the Unions of St. George's, Hanover Square, and Paddington desire to withdraw their children from this barrack school, and have applied to the Local Government Board to dissolve the Union and allow them to provide for their own children ; whether this application has been refused, and on what grounds ; whether the managers have a right to visit the school on more than one fixed day in the week ; and whether the Local Government Board has yet determined that this enormous school shall be further enlarged ; and, if not, whether he will postpone the decision of the Board until the public inquiry into the management of the Brentwood School has taken place ?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : I am aware that the West London District School at Ashford has at the present time nearly the full number of children which it will accommodate. The Guardians of the St. George's Union and of the parish of Paddington have proposed that alterations of the School District should be made, involving the separation of some of the Unions now comprised in it. The Board have not assented to this proposal, which would have the effect of increasing the charge on the Union which has least rateable value in proportion to its pauperism, and thus of benefiting the more wealthy Unions comprised in the district. The continuance of the existing School District does not involve the extension of the present school buildings, as additional accommodation may be provided by the managers by the erection of a separate school. The managers have proposed to extend the present main school building, but the Board have declined to assent. They have strongly urged the managers to erect a second and separate school, either at Ashford or on an entirely new site. The Visiting Committee of the Managers can visit the school on any day and at any hour that they may think proper, and individual managers can be authorised to visit the school at any time.

THE PLAGUE IN HONG KONG.

MR. MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that in consequence of the great plague now devastating Hong Kong serious risk of infection is likely to arise here and elsewhere through the medium of the distribution of letters delivered from Hong Kong unless these letters are disinfected ; and whether he will make such arrangements with the Post Office Authorities as will effectually lessen the risk of infection being imported into our midst through the Post Office ?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : I am not in possession of any evidence to show that there is, as suggested, any serious risk of infection in this country from the delivery of letters from Hong Kong. I shall, however, be happy to arrange for the Medical Officer of the Board conferring with the authorities of the Post Office on the subject, if they desire it.

DERELICTS AND OBSTRUCTIONS IN RIVERS.

MR. MACDONA : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the House of Lords last week gave an important judgment in the case of the "Tyne Improvement Commissioners v. the Arrows Shipping Company," the question at issue being whether appellants, as owners of the Criptal, which sank near the mouth of the River Tyne and caused an obstruction, were liable for the payment of the cost of removing the obstruction incurred by the Commissioners. Their Lordships decided that as the Company had given notice to the underwriters of the abandonment of the vessel they were not the owners, and were therefore not liable ; and whether, in view of the importance of the earliest possible notice being given to the underwriters, who by this decision are liable for the costs of removal, he will see his way to remove the block which he has placed upon the Derelict Vessels (Reports) Bill, the object of which is to request masters of ships to report to the nearest Lloyd's agent at the next place of landing what derelicts they may have seen?

MR. BRYCE: The judgment in the case referred to was given last week, and as yet is reported only in the newspapers. It appears to have decided that the shipowner was not in the circumstances liable for the cost of removing the sunken wreck; but I notice that the Lord Chancellor is reported to have said that—

“It is unnecessary to determine whether the underwriters are to be treated as the owners within the meaning of the Statute.”

If they are not, they are, of course, not liable. As the hon. Member's Bill provides for the reporting of floating derelict vessels observed on the high seas—but this particular vessel was not floating, but a sunken wreck, lay sunk near to the mouth of the River Tyne, and was, in fact, removed by the Tyne Harbour Commissioners—I do not think that the particular case of this vessel is one which his Bill would have affected, and I do not see that the principles of the decision of the House of Lords would apply to derelict vessels floating on the high sea.

ACCIDENTS IN ROTTEN ROW.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, in view of the numerous serious accidents occurring in Rotten Row, he will have an ambulance placed either at Knightsbridge Barracks or at the Park Lodge opposite to Exhibition Road?

MR. S. BUXTON (who replied) said: The First Commissioner will make arrangements for placing an ambulance at the Lodge near the Alexandra Gate.

THE IRISH CATTLE TRADE.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware of the inconvenience experienced by Irish cattle traders in being unable to book live stock at through rates to York from the ports of Cork and Waterford and the interior of Ireland, traders being now only at liberty to book through to Leeds or Normanton, according to the route they take; whether he will take the necessary steps to compel the North Eastern Company to carry into effect the law regarding through booking; and whether he intends in the proposed Railway Bill to amend the conditions under which owners of live stock are compelled to sign consignment notes by which the Railway Companies practically contract themselves out of all liability?

MR. BRYCE: My attention has been called to this matter, and the Board of Trade have been in communication with the North Eastern Railway Company on the subject. On the 10th of May that Company expressed its willingness to agree to through rates between Cork and Waterford and York on certain terms, and they have since expressed their willingness to consider applications for through rates from other places. The Board cannot compel the North Eastern Railway Company to grant through rates. The ultimate decision is with the Railway Commission. I am not aware that owners of live stock are compelled to sign consignment notes by which Railway Companies practically contract themselves out of all liability.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon): Have the Board of Trade any power to instruct counsel to appear before the Railway Commissioners in such a case as this, should it be a contravention of the law?

MR. BRYCE: I must ask for notice of that question.

MR. FIELD: Can the right hon. Gentleman do anything to put an end to the practice by which the Company only allow cattle to be booked to certain stations?

MR. BRYCE: I have not inquired into that matter, but if the hon. Member will put down a question showing a grievance in specific cases I will investigate it.

THE CONVEYANCE OF HARVESTERS FROM IRELAND.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been directed to the absence of through travelling facilities between Ireland and England on certain lines which contract to carry migratory harvesters; whether he is aware that a lapse in direct travelling and the want of any accommodation has caused much inconvenience and hardship to those poor travellers in Dublin lately, who booked by the London and North Western Railway; and whether his Department will take cognisance of this periodical occurrence, and advise carrying Companies to make due preparation for a continuous journey?

MR. BRYCE: No, Sir; I have no information as regards any such complaint. If my hon. Friend will furnish me with any particulars I shall be happy to draw the attention of the London and North Western Railway Company thereto.

JAPANESE MAIL ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. BAIRD (Glasgow, Central): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is the case that letters arrive in the United Kingdom from Shanghai from four to seven days in advance of those sent from Japan; whether this is because letters can be sent from Shanghai viâ Vancouver and New York, while those from Japan must come viâ Vancouver and Montreal; and if he will endeavour to obtain facilities for correspondents in Japan to have their letters sent by the route viâ New York if specially superscribed?

MR. A. MORLEY: It is the fact that letters from Shanghai superscribed for transmission viâ Vancouver and New York are sometimes received several days earlier than similarly superscribed letters from Japan. Representations were made some time ago to the Japanese Post Office on that subject, but that Administration was not willing to undertake to separate the superscribed letters from the correspondence sent by the ordinary route viâ Vancouver and Montreal.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN THE STRANORLAR UNION.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Report of the Local Government Board Inspector upon the labourers' cottages at Anghygart, in the Conroy Division of the Stranorlar Union, has yet reached the Department; and what steps the Government propose to take in regard to it?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Report in question has been received, but the Board have found it necessary to communicate with the Inspector on some points which arose on consideration of the Report, and at present his reply is awaited. The Board will inform the Guardians and the solicitor acting for the labourers of the result of the inquiry immediately a decision shall have been arrived at.

THE CONGO TREATY.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Great Britain now possesses the right of free transit for goods, and of erecting a telegraph wire, through the district which was leased to Great Britain under Article 3 of the Congo Treaty, now abrogated?

*SIR E. GREY: Great Britain possesses the right of free transit under the Act of Berlin. The right of constructing a telegraph line is secured by the 5th Article of the Agreement of May 12.

BARRACK CONSTRUCTION.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what barracks are now in course of construction, or about to be constructed, for the use of cavalry; and whether the Military Authorities have taken into consideration the expediency of building barracks where more than one regiment could be quartered together, so as to afford them opportunities for more frequent practice in brigade movements?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): Two barracks for cavalry regiments of the higher strength are at present under construction at the Curragh, and the remodelling of Leeds cavalry barracks is on the point of completion. The object referred to in the second paragraph of the question is kept in view in the erection of the barracks at the Curragh of which I have spoken.

THE BLACK WATCH.

MR. WILLIAM KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that in the year 1852 the 1st Battalion Black Watch returned home from the Bermudas after long foreign service; that since 1852 it has served with distinction in every campaign in which the British Army has been engaged, and during all that period has enjoyed in all only 10 years of home service; whether the battalion is now quartered in the Mauritius; and whether it is intended to give this distinguished regiment at no distant date a term of home service?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The 1st Battalion Black Watch returned home in June, 1852, after 11 years and five months' foreign service. In the 42 years since then it has been abroad 29 years and five months, and at home 12 years and seven months. The headquarters and four companies of the battalion are now at Mauritius, where they have been one year and three months. The rest of the battalion is at the Cape. Under present arrangements the battalion will not return home for about seven years, but it will move from Mauritius probably next year. The moves of regiments depend upon a roster, and one cannot be favoured except at the expense of another.

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE IN THE TRANSVAAL.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies under what Treaties made between the South African Republic and Foreign Powers, other than Great Britain, immunity from compulsory military service is accorded; which are the Foreign Powers having such Treaties; and what are the dates of such Treaties?

MR. S. BUXTON Belgium under Treaty ratified 19th August, 1882, and Portugal under Treaty ratified 7th October, 1882, have obtained for their subjects specific exemption from military service in the South African Republic. Germany, France, Italy, and Switzerland enjoy the same exemption under Most Favoured Nation Clauses in Treaties ratified on 24th June, 1886, 27th July, 1887, 29th September, 1887, and 10th September, 1888, respectively. There is, I believe, a Treaty with the Netherlands, of which I have not been able to obtain a copy.

MR. DARLING (Deptford): May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether the effect of these Treaties is that the countries named enjoy more favourable terms with regard to military service than have been secured for British subjects under the Convention of 1884?

MR. S. BUXTON: That is so.

[Commander BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) and Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) also put questions on the same subject, but the inquiries and answers were equally inaudible in the Gallery.]

KIRKDALE PRISON, LIVERPOOL.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Kirkdale Prison, in Liverpool, has for some time past been for sale; whether the Corporation of Liverpool have offered £15,000 for it; whether a private party has offered over £17,000 for it; and why the Government have not accepted either offer?

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): At the same time I may ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in parting with the site of the disused Kirkdale Gaol, the Government will take steps to secure that any future utilisation of the site will not be detrimental to the sanitary condition or the residential advantages of the neighbourhood; whether he will consider if these objects will best be secured by the control of the site passing to the hands of the constituted Local Authorities; and whether the Government will consider the feasibility of granting a portion of the site for the erection of a free Public Library, with suitable open air space surrounding the building?

MR. ASQUITH: The facts are as stated in the first three paragraphs. The only answer I can at present give to the remainder of this question and to Question 51 is that I am in communication with the Treasury on the subject.

COMMANDEERING IN THE TRANSVAAL.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is correct, as stated in the telegrams from South Africa, that British subjects in the Transvaal have within the last few days been forcibly commandeered and sent in prison waggons to fight in the Boer Army; and, if so, what action Her Majesty's Government propose to take?

The following questions also appeared on the Paper in reference to the same subject:—

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can inform the House as to the reply given by the Transvaal Government to the protest made by Her Majesty's Government against the commandeering of British subjects for military service in the Transvaal?

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) : To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if, under the Convention of 1884 with the South African Republic, Her Majesty's Government still retained the Suzerain Power in the Transvaal; whether he is aware that, whilst negotiations are pending between the Government and the Boers, British subjects resident in the Transvaal are being forcibly impressed into the military forces of the Boer Republic, and sent as prisoners to the front; and whether such action will be permitted in regard to the personal liberty of the subjects of the Suzerain Power in the Transvaal?

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL : To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with regard to the fact that the Convention of August, 1881, concedes to the Transvaal State complete self-government, subject to the suzerainty of Her Majesty, and that in the Convention of February, 1884, which replaces that of 1881 with the South African Republic, no mention is made of any claim to suzerainty, whether, in agreeing to the Convention of 1884, it was the intention and purpose of Her Majesty's Government effectively to waive all claim to suzerainty over the territories in question; and, if so, for what main reason was this course adopted? Also to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government of the South African Republic has now granted to aliens exemption from military service upon payment of a special tax; what is the amount and character of this tax; and is the privilege extended to burghers of the Republic?

MR. S. BUXTON : As regards these questions, I am afraid I am under the necessity of asking the hon. Gentlemen again kindly to postpone them till Monday, by which day I hope to be in a position to answer them.

SWINE FEVER IN DENBIGHSHIRE.

MR. H. ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been drawn to the great inconvenience caused by the operation of a recently issued Swine Fever Order in Denbighshire; whether he has received a communication from the Chairman of the Contagious Diseases Committee of the Denbighshire County Council pointing out that the fairs for the sale of swine have been suspended in the county for several months, involving serious injury to those engaged in the trade, and forwarding an urgent resolution from the Town Council of Denbigh upon the subject; whether he is aware that the district has been free of the fever for practically the whole period of the Order; and whether, in view of this fact and of the undoubted hardship suffered through the suspension of the sale of swine in such a district, he can see his way to withdrawing the restrictions now in force?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden) : It is the case that my attention has been drawn to the inconvenience attending the operations against swine fever in Denbighshire, in common with the rest of the country, and that I have received the communication to which my hon. Friend refers. I am sorry, however, to be unable to confirm the statement that the county is free from disease. Three outbreaks have been reported during the present month, and we have reason to fear that the requirements of the law as to the notification of disease are not so fully complied with as we could wish. In these circumstances, I regret that I am unable to afford the county any relief at the present time; but if the Local Authority will carry out with vigour and complete efficiency their share of the difficult task which has been imposed upon us by Parliament, I do not doubt that the disease may soon be extirpated from their district, in which case we might be able to make arrangements which would enable the restrictions on their markets to be withdrawn without fear of the reintroduction of disease.

CORN RETURNS.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he has yet considered the second recommendation of the Select Committee upon Corn Sales, given in their Report, printed May, 1893, that in every case where conversion of weighed measure takes place, the weights laid down in Section 8 of "The Corn Returns Act, 1882," should always be published in the Returns of Corn Sold, in The London Gazette, and a statement made to the effect that the prices quoted in the Gazette are the prices for the quarter of eight bushels of such statutory weights; and whether he is now prepared to carry out such recommendation?

MR. H. GARDNER: I have not lost sight of the recommendation to which the hon. Member refers; but I find that considerable practical difficulty would attend any attempt to indicate in the Gazette Returns the particular cases in which the conversion directed by Section 8 of "The Corn Returns Act, 1882," has taken place. If the purpose of the hon. Member would be served by the insertion of a note at the foot of the Returns setting out the requirements of that section, I do not think that any objection would present itself, and I should be happy to confer with him on the subject.

THE SOUTH WALES COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydfil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, following the Report for last year of Mr. Henry Hall, Her Majesty's Inspector of Mines for the Liverpool District, to the Home Secretary, in which he remarked that, of the whole of the dusts tested, that from the Albion Colliery, Glamorgan (the colliery in which the terrible explosion took place last Saturday), excelled all others in violence and sensitiveness to explosion, any special, and if so what, instructions were given by the Home Office to the Inspectors for the district with a view of minimising the danger to life in that particular colliery?

MR. ASQUITH: The Report alluded to is the Report for 1893 of Mr. Hall, the Inspector for the Liverpool District, which was only received at the Home Office on May 23, 1894. As the hon. Member is aware, a Royal Commission has been for some time sitting upon the subject of coal dust, and Mr. Hall and other Inspectors have been assisting them. Last year a new set of special Rules were promulgated for South Wales, in which the Albion Colliery lies, but the colliery proprietors rejected them, and proceeded to an arbitration, which is now pending. It is only fair to say that none of these Rules directly dealt with coal dust, though some of them dealt with lamps and blasting. The importance of coal dust as a means of spreading explosion is now becoming understood, but opinions differ as to the mode of preventing it, and till the Report of the Coal Dust Commission is issued it is not possible to say what measures ought to be taken, nor how far they will require a fresh Act of Parliament.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Why was the Report delayed so long?

MR. ASQUITH: There was no unusual delay.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been called to the fact that many hundreds of men have already lost their lives in this coal vein, which the Inspector emphasises as one of the most dangerous seams in the United Kingdom? Why were not precautions taken, and instructions sent out immediately the Report was received?

MR. ASQUITH: It must be remembered that the Report came, not from the Inspector of the district, but from the Inspector of the Liverpool District, and obviously it was impossible to take any action without first consulting the Inspector of the district.

EXPLOSIONS AT WALTHAM FACTORY.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Committee appointed to inquire into the explosion of the 7th of May at the Waltham Cordite Factory has yet reported; and when the Report and Evidence will be presented to Parliament?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am informed that the Committee hope to finish their work during next week. No time will be lost in presenting the Report and Evidence to Parliament.

TEA AND INSANITY.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the special Report on the alleged increasing prevalence of insanity in Ireland; by which it appears that in the last 40 years the lunatics have increased by 200 per cent., and that amongst the causes given in the Report for this increase is the immoderate consumption of tea and the excessive use of that article of diet; and whether the Government will consider the expediency of checking such intemperance by increased taxation or legislative regulation?

MR. J. MORLEY: With the permission of the House, I will reply to this question. The conclusion at which the Inspectors of Lunatics arrived in their Report referred to was that the consumption of decocted or over-infused tea may, when taken in excess, produce such evil results as dyspepsia, restlessness, or sleeplessness, and so may possibly—at least in certain subjects—favour the development of insanity. The remedy for this state of things, which affects the dietetic habits of the people, is entirely a matter of the preparation of the tea, and we have hardly yet come to such a point that we are prepared to settle by Act of Parliament how long tea shall be infused or how many spoonfuls shall be put into the teapot.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in the Report on the destitution amongst the unemployed in Scotland attention is also called to this matter?

MR. J. MORLEY: No, Sir; my attention is entirely confined to the affairs of Ireland.

PAROCHIAL ELECTORS (REGISTRATION ACCELERATION) BILL.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, having regard to the importance of promptly passing the Parochial Electors (Registration Acceleration) Bill into law, and to the impossibility of passing the Bill after 12 o'clock at night, he will put down the Bill as first Order on as early a day as possible?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby):

I am anxious to get the Bill through as soon as I can; but at present I cannot state the best method of accomplishing that object.

INLAND REVENUE AFFIDAVIT.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, before the Report stage of the Finance Bill, he will lay upon the Table draft of the revised Inland Revenue Affidavit, referred to in Clause 19, Subsection (4), of the Bill?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am unable to lay the draft of the revised Inland Revenue Affidavit upon the Table before the Report stage of the Finance Bill, as it will most probably require to be amended in order to incorporate changes made on Report.

NAVAL DEFENCE FINANCE.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether a sum of £289,000 borrowed under "The Naval Defence Act, 1889," will be applied towards the ordinary Expenditure of the Exchequer for the current year 1894-5?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes, Sir.

MR. BARTLEY: Then it is correct that the whole of this year's Expenditure will not be paid out of the Income of the year? Is not that in contravention of the cardinal principle of sound finance as laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself? Are we to understand that the Expenditure of neither this year nor last year will be paid out of current Income?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Member had better reserve that point until we come to the clause dealing with this matter. I shall then be able to answer him.

THE ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT CARNOT.

SIR G. RUSSELL (Berks, Wokingham): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the terrible murder of the President of the French Republic and other recent crimes perpetrated by certain miscreants termed Anarchists, Her Majesty's Government, in concert with the other European Governments, would endeavour, either through the extension of the Extradition Acts or otherwise, to devise means for the prevention or diminution of such crimes in future?

SIR W. HARCOURT: My hon. Friend will feel that this is much too large a subject for me to attempt to deal with in answer to a question.

THE POLICE AND LABOUR MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE asked the Secretary for Scotland as to the reasons for the action of the police in breaking up a meeting at Pollokshaws, and under whose instructions the Police Inspector acted?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): I am informed by the Police Commissioners of Pollokshaws that no action was taken in regard to the meeting in question until the proceedings had lasted an hour, when the Inspector of Police, acting within his discretion, gave orders to disperse the meeting, as the crowd had increased to such an extent as to form an obstruction both on the street and the pavement. Pollokshaws is not a square or an open space at all suitable for meetings of so large a character. It is only about 32 feet wide between the pavements, and is the principal street or thoroughfare along which the tramway runs, and there is always a great amount of traffic. No notice of the labour meeting was given to the Burgh Authorities, or they would have suggested to the organisers that the vacant space at the Shawbridge, or one of the public parks, as being better adapted for their purpose. Since the meeting was held, the Inspector of Police has requested the captain of the Salvation Army to remove his meetings to a more convenient spot, to which he has agreed, and no such meetings are now held at the Cross. I may add that the Police Commissioners, who are the guardians of the peace and order of the burgh, have, at a public meeting, unanimously approved of the action of the Inspector of Police throughout the matter.

THE CLOSURE OF THE SPIRIT DUTY CLAUSE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is correctly reported in to-day's papers as having stated that there was an arrangement between the two sides of the House by which a Division on the clause dealing with the Spirit Duty was to be taken yesterday afternoon?

*SIR W. HARCOURT: I made no such statement. I said that it was understood that a Division was to be taken. I said nothing about an arrangement at all. That is my understanding, and it is confirmed by what took place yesterday. The idea seems to be that the House was taken by surprise. I certainly should be extremely sorry if it were thought that I had been a party to anything like a surprise on the House. What happened yesterday was this: When Clause 27 was called there were a number of Amendments, but not one of them was moved. The Motion was then put that Clause 27 stand part of the Bill. Upon that the Member for Galway made a speech against the clause. The Member for York made some observations which were ruled not to be pertinent to the clause. Thereupon the Member for North Dublin County rose and said he would move the rejection of the clause, but he made no observations upon it. The Chairman pointed out that an Amendment of that kind was unnecessary, as the question would be put that the clause stand part of the Bill. The hon. Member for North Dublin made no observations on the clause, and nobody else rose to discuss it. Thereupon the Member for Wimbledon then moved to report Progress, and when he rose I stated—I think the words are correctly reported in The Standard and other newspapers—that I could not accept that Motion, as it was generally understood that the Division would be taken. If anyone had risen and said there was no such understanding and that there was a desire for further discussion I should at once have agreed to the Motion to report Progress. It was perfectly open to anyone to debate the Motion to report Progress. Nobody said a single word. Nobody took any objection. I had no reason to believe that anyone desired to continue the Debate. The Division was taken. I then moved the Closure, and it is a remarkable thing that the hon. Gentleman opposite found it difficult to find anyone to tell with him against it. ["No, no!"] I am in the recollection of everyone who was present. ["No, no!"] There was no resistance. There was not a word said by anybody representing the Front Bench or anybody else. I may also say that when, on Monday night, I suggested that the Votes on the Beer and Spirit Duties should be taken on Tuesday, the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition said he thought the Beer Vote only ought to be taken on Tuesday. I was then asked whether I was going to take Supply on Wednesday, and I said "No," because I thought it was necessary and desirable that we should get on as fast as we could with the Finance Bill. I do not say that the exact words were used that the Division would be taken on Wednesday; but certainly the general understanding was that a Division would be taken on the Wednesday. I cannot charge myself with having shown any desire on this Bill to stifle discussion. I have had relations with the Leader of the Opposition of a most friendly character with reference to the Bill, and I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will not suspect me of endeavouring to mislead him or the House in a matter of the conduct of Public Business.

*MR. BONSOR (Surrey, Wimbledon) said, that as the matter was personal to him, he asked the indulgence of the House to say two or three words. The circumstances of the case were these: He rose at 5.29 and moved that Progress be reported. In making that Motion he stated that to his knowledge several gentlemen—whose names, if necessary, he could have given—desired to speak. He certainly was the last man to break an arrangement if there had been one, and he was the last Member to move to report Progress if he anticipated that it would not be accepted.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, I accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, in spite of the statement on Tuesday night, in spite of what my hon. Friend has just said, in spite of facts within the knowledge of every single man except the right hon. Gentleman, who was ignorant that anyone wanted to discuss the Spirit Duties, though the newspapers for weeks past had made it notorious that it was on that subject that we expected to have one of our great battles. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman was so occupied with his other important avocations that he was not aware of this elementary fact in connection with the Bill of which he has charge. I would ask him whether he can remedy the unfortunate occurrence and allay the natural irritation that has arisen from it, and the consequences that will flow from that natural irritation, by giving us a promise that he will give us a proper opportunity to discuss the question by moving to re-commit the Bill in respect to this clause, so that the opportunity which we have lost may be regained?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Of course, I shall be willing to give hon. Members another opportunity of discussing the matter if they consider that the opportunity has been taken from them. Whether the way of doing this suggested by the right hon. Gentleman is the best way I cannot say off-hand, and I reserve my opinion on the point. There may be some more convenient method.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not press for a hurried statement as to the mode in which we are to be allowed to discuss the question, but I wish it to be understood that it must be discussed in Committee and not on Report.

MOTION.

T.R.H. THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF YORK.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

*SIR W. HARCOURT rose to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to congratulate Her Majesty on the birth of a son to His Royal Highness the Duke and Her Royal Highness the Duchess of York."

He said: In rising to make the Motion of which I have given notice it is not, I know, necessary that I should use many words to commend that Motion to the acceptance of the House. This House would ill reflect the sentiments of the people it represents if it did not express its sympathy in connection with an event which has brought joy to the heart of the Sovereign and of the nation. The actual rule of Queen Victoria has been prolonged beyond that of any of her predecessors, and as years have rolled by the Throne has been more strongly rooted in the confidence of the nation, and the person of the Sovereign has become more and more endeared to the heart of her people. The Queen has reigned through a protracted time, in which she has seen a longer period of peace and a greater growth of the prosperity of her people than it has fallen to the lot of any of her ancestors to see. But, as we all know, human nature is born to sorrow, which is increased by the burden of a great Empire. The House of Commons and the nation have evinced their sympathy on former occasions with the grief of the Queen, and they desire to associate themselves to-day, on the anniversary of her Coronation, with her joy. We know it brings joy to Her Majesty's heart to feel that the succession to the great Empire over which she has ruled for more than half a century is secured in her descendants to the third generation—a prospect, I believe, which was not given to any of those who have gone before her. We share in that joy, and take this occasion to offer our heartfelt congratulations to the Queen. I beg, Sir, to move the Resolution standing in my name.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I desire, in my own name and in that of my friends, to associate myself with the congratulation which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has just offered on behalf of this House and on behalf of the country to the Sovereign on the recent auspicious event. We take it as our right as well as our privilege, as our privilege as well as our right, to associate ourselves with any event in which the happiness or unhappiness of our Royal Family is concerned. The succession of our Sovereigns is the thread by which the history of this country is connected together, the thread on which it hangs, and we may express our hopes that the infant just born may when most of us, at all events, have left this scene and when the dust of our controversies has been laid by the kindly hands of time, and when problems which now so deeply occupy us shall merely excite the languid interest of the historian—we may hope that he, a Sovereign of these realms, will maintain the great constitutional traditions of his ancestors, and will fulfil as they have done the great office entrusted to him and worthily represent the unity and dignity of a free and self-governing people. I beg to second the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to congratulate Her Majesty on the birth of a son to His Royal Highness the Duke and Her Royal Highness the Duchess of York.”—(Sir W. Harcourt.)

*MR. KEIR-HARDIE (West Ham, S.): Mr. Speaker, on my own behalf and those whom I represent, I am unable to join in this public address. I owe no allegiance to any hereditary ruler—[interruption—and I will expect those who do to allow me the ordinary courtesies of debate. The Resolution, Sir, proposes to congratulate Her Majesty on the birth of a son to the Duke and Duchess of York. It seeks to elevate to an importance which it does not deserve an event of everyday occurrence. I have been delighted to learn that the child is a fairly healthy one, and had I had the opportunity of meeting its parents I should have been pleased indeed to join in the ordinary congratulations of the occasion, but when we are asked as the House of Commons representing the nation to join in these congratulations then in the interests of the dignity of the House I take leave to protest. There is one aspect of this question which concerns the House of Commons. A Minister of the Government is required to be present on this interesting occasion. I submit, Sir, that such a proceeding is not calculated to enhance the dignity of this House in the eyes of the nation. [Interruption, and a VOICE: “Rot!”] Hon. Gentlemen may say “rot.” If those hon. Gentlemen mixed as freely as I do with the common people they would know their opinions on this question. From that point of view it seems to me that a protest of some kind ought to be made by this House. It is a matter of small concern to me whether the future ruler of the nation be the genuine article or a spurious imitation. Now, Sir, this proposal has been made because a child has been born into the Royal Family. We have a right to ask what particular blessing the Royal Family has conferred upon the nation that we should be asked to take part in this proceeding to-day. We have just heard it said that Her Majesty had ruled for over half a century. I would correct that, Sir, by saying that Her Majesty has reigned, but has not ruled. I remember in reading the proceedings in connection with the Jubilee that the one point made was that during the 50 years of Her Majesty's reign the Queen had not interfered in the affairs of the nation. That may be reigning, but it certainly is not ruling. Then there is the Prince of Wales. What special advantage has His Royal Highness conferred upon the nation?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): I rise, Sir, for the purpose of moving that the hon. Member be no longer heard.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I hope that the hon. and gallant Member will not press his Motion. I do not think it would tend to produce the result which he desires, and which, I think, we all desire—namely, the prevention of disorder.

*MR. KEIR-HARDIE: I was about to observe that I do not know anything in the career or the life of the Prince of Wales which commends him especially to me. The "fierce white light" which we are told "beats upon the Throne" sometimes reveals things in his career—it would be better to keep covered. Sometimes we get glimpses of the Prince at the gaming tables, sometimes on the racecourse. His Royal Highness is Duke of Cornwall, and as such he draws £60,000 a year from the Duchy property in London, which is made up of some of the vilest slums—[Cries of "Question!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is not now speaking to the Resolution before the House.

*MR. KEIR-HARDIE: I will bow to your ruling, Sir, and proceed to the subject of the Resolution. We are asked to rejoice because this child has been born, and that one day he will be called to rule over this great Empire. Up to the present time we have no means of knowing what his qualification or fitness for that task may be. It certainly strikes me—I do not know how it strikes others—as rather strange that those who have so much to say about the hereditary element in another place should be so willing to endorse it in this particular instance. It seems to me that if it is a good argument to say that the hereditary element is bad in one case, it is an equally good argument to say that it is bad in the other. From his childhood onward this boy will be surrounded by sycophants and flatterers by the score—[Cries of "Oh, oh!"—and will be taught to believe himself as of a superior creation. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] A line will be drawn between him and the people whom he is to be called upon some day to reign over. In due course, following the precedent which has already been set, he will be sent on a tour round the world, and probably rumours of a morganatic alliance will follow—[Loud cries of "Oh, oh!" and "Order!" and "Question!"—and the end of it all will be that the country will be called upon to pay the bill. [Cries of "Divide!"] As a matter of principle, I protest against this Motion being passed, and if there is another Member of the House who shares the principles I hold I will carry my protest the length of a Division. The Government will not find an opportunity for a Vote of Condolence with the relatives of those who are lying stiff and stark in a Welsh valley, and, if that cannot be done, the Motion before the House ought never to have been proposed either. If it be for rank and title only that time and occasion can be found in this House, then the sooner that truth is known outside the better for the House itself. I will challenge a Division on the Motion, and if the Forms of the House will permit, I will go to a Division in the hope that some Members at least will enter their protest against the mummery implied in a Resolution of this kind.

*MR. SPEAKER: The question is that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to congratulate Her Majesty on the birth of a son to His Royal Highness the Duke and Her Royal Highness the Duchess of York.

[The putting of the Question was followed by loud cries of "Aye" from all parts of the House, Mr. Keir-Hardie alone replying in the negative. Mr. Speaker declared that "I think the Ayes have it," but Mr. Keir-Hardie challenged the statement. The House was cleared for a Division. On Mr. Speaker again putting the Question Mr. Keir-Hardie repeated his negative, but did not again challenge Mr. Speaker's words "The Ayes have it."]

The Address was accordingly agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.—(No. 190.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 27th June.]

[TWENTY-FIRST NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 28.

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that, referring to the fact that the 27th clause of the Bill, relating to the additional duty on spirits, had been unexpectedly closed last evening, said the present Clause (28) was not objectionable, and he did not propose to offer any opposition to it. He, however, desired to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to explain in what way he proposed to give facilities for further discussing the Spirit Duty Clause, which was rushed through Committee, contrary to an express understanding, without any reasonable time having been allowed for considering it.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he should like further time to consider the matter. Did the right hon. Gentleman think there was any great difference whether the further discussion was taken in Committee or on Report?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he thought there was a very considerable difference. He did not think that the imposition of a new tax had ever been discussed upon Report without having been first settled in Committee. That was a constitutional reason against considering the details of the clause on Report. He thought that they should have restored to them the privilege of further discussing the clause which, through a misunderstanding, they were deprived of yesterday. To tell them that they could discuss the clause on Report was to restore nothing to them. The right hon. Gentleman had expressed a cordial desire to see that everything that went wrong yesterday should be put right in the future. It would be necessary that some amicable arrangement should be arrived at. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed that they should discuss it on a new clause or by re-committal of the Bill in respect of Clause 27?

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he would certainly consider how it might be done. He had not really thought anything about in what form the further discussion should be taken. He fancied that they could only re-commit a Bill for the purpose of striking something out altogether or with a view of substitution. He understood the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman, and he would endeavour to give him the opportunity he asked for.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 29.

MR. MARTIN (Worcester, Droitwich) said, that he moved the Amendment standing in his name in order to call the attention of the Committee to the actual position of the payers of Income Tax. The payment was to be made in pursuance of a Resolution of the House and in accordance with custom, but a Resolution was of no legal force till it had been embodied in a Bill, and till that Bill had passed into an Act ratified by the approval of the House. He thought that the imposition of new and increased taxation by a mere Resolution was a dangerous practice, and he believed that the Income Tax was the only tax which came into operation in this manner as an increased tax. The House had lately been reminded that the estate of a recently deceased person had been rapidly hurried over in order, it was said, to avoid the increased Estate Duty; and if large payments could be thus treated, it was only just that the smaller individual payments on account of Income Tax should be treated in a similar fashion. At the same time, he was willing to admit that if the Amendment he had put down on this occasion were accepted by the House it would make "confusion worse confounded." During the months of April, May, and June the interest was paid on many loans, on which the tax had been deducted at 8d. If this had to be refunded it would cause very considerable practical trouble. He had, therefore, no intention of pressing his Amendment, but he begged to move it in order to elicit from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer a statement of the exact legal position of the payers of Income Tax at the increased rate.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 33, to leave out the words "which commenced on the sixth day of April," and insert the words "commencing on the first day of August."—(Mr. Martin.)

SIR W. HARCOURT said, this matter was discussed last year and pretty well threshed out on a Motion by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London. It was perfectly true that until the Budget Bill was passed the actual authority for levying any taxation was not complete. It was not his fault that the Budget Bill had not passed into law many weeks ago. He desired that it should, but apparently it had been the desire of the House that it should not. The question was, What was to be done in the interval between the Budget Resolutions and the passing of the Bill? It had always been the practice, with reference to the duties of Customs and Excise, that they should be levied from the date of the Resolutions. If that were not done the Revenue would be seriously injured. If this Amendment were carried, there would be four months of the Income Tax sacrificed, which would be extremely injurious to the country, bringing about a deficit. He felt sure that the hon. Gentleman would not attempt to disturb a practice which was absolutely necessary for the protection of the Revenue.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright) said, he had been requested by the hon. Member for North Dorset (Mr. Wingfield-Digby) to move the Amendment standing in that hon. Gentleman's name. It was one of the most important Amendments to be moved on the Bill. The clause provided that a duty of 8d. in the £1 should be charged on the annual value or amount of property, profits, and gains chargeable under Schedules (A), (C), (D), and (E), and the object of the Amendment was to provide that it should be the net and not the gross value that should be so charged. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had already made a concession to the Leader of the Opposition, and that, he should think, rather paved the way for taking an equitable view of this Amendment. If there was any part of the Bill in which they might have equality between personality and realty, it was surely in Income Tax assessment. Up to the present Income Tax had always been paid on the gross rental, a thing which was disastrous to the owners of realty. Anyone knowing anything about realty must be aware that there were countless expenses connected with it. To ascertain the net rental of property, it was necessary not only to deduct all burdens—all family charges—but all repairs to the estate, which ought to comprise drainage, dilapidations, and certain royalties which had to be paid both on stone and minerals. Then they came to Land Tax, Property Tax, the parochial rates, various charges—whether payable to Local Authorities or to the Government. There were also the tithereut-charge, the charge for repairs and renewal of buildings, and for estate labour, which was necessary to keep the estate in a proper state of cultivation. The effect of all these charges was that, although a landlord lived upon an estate, and was nominally its owner, he could not be said to possess it. If he did his duty by his tenants he had to spend very often from 40 to 60 per cent. on every £100 he received on the ordinary up-keep of the estate. He knew estates which were extremely well managed, under liberal covenants, where the greatest attention was paid not only to the tenantry, but to the cottagers. Considerable improvements were made, which, no doubt, were not of pressing—that was to say, which could be put off—from time to time in order to give employment to the labourers, but no deduction was made from the taxes by the Crown. There was no allowance for fire insurance and management, or in respect of tenants who in bad years were unable to comply with the requirements of their leases. This condition of things had already been recognised in a manner by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In the 31st clause of the Bill the right hon. Gentleman proposed to allow an abatement of 10 per cent. But that statement would not look at this matter. He would not look at the repairs and consequent charges upon an estate kept up in a proper manner. Therefore, he submitted that seeing that they were called upon to pay an equal charge with personality, and that they were paying 12 per cent. of local burdens quite independent of Imperial taxation, he thought they should be put on equality of treatment, which, he understood, was one of the great principles of the Bill. He humbly submitted that the reasons he had given in favour of the Amendment were conclusive.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 37, after the word "the," to insert the word "net."—(Sir Mark Stewart.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'net' be there inserted."

*SIR W. HARCOURT said, he ventured to submit to the hon. Baronet that this was not the proper place to raise the question. In the framework of the Bill they kept the Income Tax as it was at present, and they made allowances for the subject-matter to which the hon. Member had referred. That was done in Clause 31. It was on that clause that the question would arise as to what allowances were to be made from the annual value of land, and they could not deal with those allowances till that clause was reached. The hon. Member would gain no advantage by endeavouring to anticipate Clause 31; in fact, he (Sir W. Harcourt) was not at all sure that if he pressed the Amendment, and the insertion of the word "net" were negatived, it would be possible afterwards to make allowances. It was not at present the desire or the intention of the Government that Income Tax should be levied on the gross value of real property.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said, that if the danger foreshadowed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer were a real one, and the fact of the word "net" being negatived, rendered it impossible subsequently to make allowances, that would be a reason for postponing the discussion of the proposed Amendment. On this point, however, he should like to hear the ruling of the Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the Amendment was negatived here it would seriously embarrass the moving of Amendments in the same sense later on. I do not say that the present Amendment is out of Order; still, I am bound to say that this appears a very inconvenient place to move it.

SIR MARK STEWART said, that after the ruling of the Chairman he would not press the Amendment, leaving the matter to be raised on Clause 31.

MR. CHAPLIN asked for a ruling from the Chair as to whether or not the question must be raised now.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Raise it, but you must do it at your own peril.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already given my view, that if this Amendment were pressed and negatived, it would seriously interfere with anybody who wished to amend the Bill in that direction on Clause 31. Of course, I cannot answer the question definitely until I have seen the Amendments to Clause 31.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BARTLEY rose to move, in page 17, line 38, after "gains," insert "derived from realised property of any kind." He said, if his Amendment were accepted, this part of the clause would then read,

"For every twenty shillings of the annual value or amount of property, profits, and gains derived from realised property of any kind chargeable under Schedules (a), (c), (d), or (e) of the said Act, the duty of eightpence."

He knew very well that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, he would say this was an old story. He thought on the last occasion the right hon. Gentleman said he had heard the question raised about 45 times. Although it might be very interesting, it was no consolation to the sufferers to know it had been raised so often, and yet that no benefit had been given them. Although this matter had been put off from year to year since 1842, he thought they ought still to continue to discuss it; and in the same way as the continual dropping of water would wear away a stone, so the continual bringing up of this matter might make an impression upon the heart of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which, he believed, was a tender heart when it could be got at. It had always been held that there was an immense practical difference between incomes derived from industry and those derived from realised property, and that it was right and proper there should be some difference of taxation in regard to them. Since 1842, when the Income Tax was established on its present basis, the receipt had increased enormously; and as the increase had gone on, the burdens had fallen more and more upon that very hardworking class of the community, the moderate people who were engaged in the absolute industry and work of the country. The smaller and middle class, and the lower middle class of all the classes in the world, were the most deserving of their careful attention. They were really the backbone of the country, carrying on its great commercial and industrial enterprises. That the taxation of this class should be fair was of supreme importance to the welfare of the country. There was no doubt that the further increase of benefits at the bottom of the scale—which they had not yet reached—would help a good many, but they would not touch the point he was aiming at. The increase of the maximum of the exemption from £400 to £500, and the raising the exemption from £120 to £160, were advantageous to smaller persons. But these very alterations in raising the limit rather aggravated the grievance to which he was calling attention, because the person who derived £500 a year from Consols was really a comparatively rich man compared with the man who only got £500 a year, which was dependent upon his life, health, and continued industry. Inasmuch as they were going to exempt all persons up to £500 a year, whether their incomes were derived from realised property or from their own industry, that very fact rather accentuated and intensified the hardship to which the persons he referred to had to suffer, and further emphasised the necessity for a change in the direction he indicated. Glad as he was to see the extensions which had been made in the bottom of the scale, he would have very much preferred that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in this very revolutionary Budget, should have gone a little further in this direction, and made a revolution in the sense of changing the incidence of taxation with regard to incomes derived from investments of capital and spontaneous incomes. The two persons who received their income—the one from realised property, and the other from his own work and industry, contingent on his life—were in a totally different position. The one derived an income from a source which continued after his death, and which was permanent without his having to put anything by for the future. The man who had the same moderate income from his own industry was bound to provide for the contingencies of life, and to make provision for his family in the event of his death. To make adequate provisions for these contingencies would amount to a tax upon him of at least 2s. in the £1, whereas the man who had the same income from realised property was, of course, saved the entire amount of that expenditure. The two families had to pay exactly the same in taxation for all purposes; therefore, it was clear that one man was immensely better off than the other. But under the proposed taxation of the Government, the two were to be taxed exactly alike in respect to their incomes, and that seemed to him a great hardship. In 1842 Lord Brougham distinctly stated that it was expedient to make a distinction between the income derived from capital and the income derived from industry, levying a smaller Income Tax on the latter than on the former. In the same year Lord John Russell in the House of Commons supported a proposition that all incomes derived from trade, profession, employment, or avocation, should be almost entirely exempted from the Income Tax then proposed. The only objections he had ever heard from Chancellors of the Exchequer, with reference to an Amendment of this character, were two. In the first place, it was said there were a certain number of rich people who enjoyed these industrial income. No doubt that was true; but, after all, it was not a crime for a man to be rich from the result of his industry, or that a man should work hard and be successful. He thought there was even a stronger case for this Amendment now than there ever had been before. They had heard in these Debates that these excessive Death Duties were a sort of compound Income Tax, and that rich persons were to pay these accumulated funds on death, so that the inequality was to be levelled up. If that were so, it made it fairer they should consider this change, because the great argument had always been with regard to men who were rich, and who derived large incomes from their industry, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not desire to exempt them. Another argument against the Amendment was the trouble that would be involved in making this change. He remembered some years ago the present Member for Midlothian, whom, he regretted to say, they were not to see again in the House, stating that to change and re-arrange the Income Tax system would take 100 years. But in the present Budget, the discussions on which had only lasted three weeks, they had completely altered the whole fiscal system of the Death Duties, so that he was quite sure it would be possible to alter the whole system of the Income Tax in a much shorter time; and although the trouble to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the permanent officials would be great, that was no reason why they should continue to inflict this hardship. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that these graduations proposed by the Bill, to a certain extent in a rough-and-ready sort of way, met the several points raised by the Amendment. They did in a sense, but in a wrong sense, and they did not touch the identical points. It was quite true they did accumulate sums to be paid after the death of the man, and made a rough-and-ready system of making the richer persons pay more than they did now—which he did not object to—but they did not in any way distinguish between spontaneous and industrious incomes. He contended that such incomes should be put on a fair basis; and inasmuch as this Bill was going to revolutionise the system of the payment of Death Duties, it seemed to him this was a most opportune moment to change this system of the incidence of the Income Tax. Under the taxation of the Death Duties, life insurance, which was one of the large items the prudent man would have to provide for, would be heavily taxed after death. These persons who had small industrial incomes would be obliged more than ever to insure their lives, and under this system when their estates fell in at their death a very large sum of money would be raised from the amount of their life insurance, and they were to be taxed exactly the same, and not in any way less, as those who derived their incomes from realised property. He supposed the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say this was another of those attacks they had been making upon different parts of the Budget proposals, and that he could not afford to make this change. He had no doubt that scarcity of money was one of the great cries of the day, and that the right hon. Gentleman would say at once that if this proposal were carried it would mean a reduction of his receipts. What he (Mr. Bartley) said was, that the raising of the money necessary for carrying on the Empire should be raised in a fair and proper manner. They were bound to consider, in the raising of taxation, that the greatest possible fairness should be used; and when they were changing, especially their great fiscal system, they should make it as fair as they could in every possible direction. Everybody agreed as to the justice of the principle embodied in the Amendment, and the only person who was disinclined to carry it out was the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because he knew it would have a tendency to reduce the receipts. The present system was a great hardship on the widow who was entitled to the relief which would be given by the Amendment, whilst everybody agreed that what the Amendment sought to remedy was a standing grievance which ought to be done away with. He begged to propose the Amendment, which he earnestly hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would see his way to accept.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 38, after the word "gains," to insert the words "derived from realised property of any kind."—(Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT observed that the hon. Member had said that the constant dropping of water would wear away a stone. He (Sir W. Harcourt) was the unfortunate stone.

MR. BARTLEY: No, I said you were the tender heart.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that at any rate he hoped this constant dripping would not knock a hole in his Budget. The Amendment raised a question of principle which had been discussed over and over again. The hon. Member knew that the matter had been examined carefully in recent times, and the Committee over which the late Sir Stafford Northcote presided declared that, plausible as it might appear, the proposal to make a distinction between industrial and permanent incomes was totally impracticable. The remedy must be sought in another direction, and first of all they must put upon realised incomes, not under the Income Tax but in some other form, a larger share of taxation. He agreed with the hon. Member that there should be more distinction between the two classes of income, and a distinction had been made. For instance, if they had not raised more money by the Death Duties upon realised estates they must have raised a greater sum from the Income Tax, and it was for that very reason the Government were making the proposal to which the Amendment had reference. The proposal of the Government, therefore, was really in lieu of an increase of the Income Tax, which must have been made but for the proposal in reference to the Death Duties. As was pointed out by the right hon. Member for Midlothian, that was essentially the direction in which they should proceed, in order, to a certain degree, to remedy the very evil of which the hon. Member complained. Small tradesmen would be immensely benefited under this Budget — that was to say, tradesmen whose incomes were under £500 a year, and that class formed one of the most important elements in society. The acceptance of the Amendment, however, would exclude from this charge all the great manufacturers, brewers, bankers, and others who would pay under the 6d. scale instead of the 8d. scale, while it would include under the higher charge the widow with a pension or an annuity of £100 a year, because she had a fixed income. Therefore, hundreds of thousands of people with small fixed incomes would have to pay on a higher scale than persons with much larger incomes derived from industry. This matter had been considered over and over again, and the Government could not accept the Amendment.

MR. BOUSFIELD said, he had foreseen there was very little hope of the Chancellor of the Exchequer giving way on this question; but he hoped his hon. Friend who had made the Motion would remain importunate and press the matter until he had got a better answer than that he had just received. There were, of course, practical difficulties in the way, and he should recommend that his hon. Friend should not make so sweeping a proposal. Instead of applying it to all incomes, spontaneous or industrial, he might begin by applying it to purely precarious incomes.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Say the income of lawyers.

MR. BOUSFIELD said, the right hon. Gentleman might surely do something by way of remedy. Take the case of a spontaneous income of £500 as against a professional man's income of £1,000 a year—say the income of a lawyer, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had suggested. The professional man's income was one which depended upon his own health and strength, and he was in a very much inferior position to the man whose income was a spontaneous one of £500 a year. There was, in fact, a great inequality, and they must go on pressing this matter year after year until it was remedied. In addition to lawyers and other professional men there were a large number of clerks whose incomes were precarious and dependent solely upon the maintenance of their health and strength, and these, he submitted, ought to be treated on a wholly different scale from those who had corresponding incomes derived from investments. Perhaps, if his hon. Friend confined his efforts to the classes whose earnings were precarious, he would have a better chance of success. If a person was able to prove that his income would cease in case of illness or death he ought certainly to be entitled to an abatement of 25 or 20 per cent., or some figure of about that kind. That was a practical suggestion which might be acceded to without difficulty.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Islington was most consistent in pressing this proposed alteration upon the attention of Her Majesty's Government, no matter which Party were in power, but he would have probably anticipated that it would not be possible for himself and the other occupants of the Front Opposition Bench to support the Amendment, which was no doubt very plausible and appealed to their sympathies in the interests of a struggling class. There were always two questions to be considered in dealing with a particular tax—first, the principle of equality as between individual and individual; and, secondly, the practicability of carrying out any special change. He thought that if his hon. Friend were to feel that the proposed change would have the effect of knocking to pieces so valuable an instrument of taxation as the Income Tax undoubtedly was, he would see that there had been adduced against his proposal an argument which practical politicians could not overlook. Every successive Chancellor of the Exchequer had been forced to the conclusion that the proposed reform was not one which could be carried out with safety to the administration of the country. He thought that his hon. Friend should, for this year at any rate, rest satisfied with the concessions which had been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in favour of small incomes.

MR. BARTLEY said, that his right hon. Friend was, of course, tarred with the same brush as the Chancellor of the Exchequer in regard to this proposal. He should, however, keep pegging away, for he was satisfied that the matter was growing, and that a happy day would at last come when a Chancellor of the Exchequer would arise who would see that justice was done. The public were being educated up to it, and, when that education was complete, no Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to resist. In answer to the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, he might say that when he had brought forward his proposal in a modified form it was objected to on the ground of its being brought forward in dribblets. Under the present circumstances, he was satisfied with the discussion, and begged leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central), in moving an Amendment to maintain the Income Tax at 7d., said: The two years during which Her Majesty's present Advisers have been in power have been distinguished by bad trade, by lower incomes, by diminished employment. They have been pressed in vain for remedial measures. Their only answer has been an increase of taxation. The Income Tax, a War Tax in its origin, is to be raised to 8d. On behalf of the industrial community I represent, I have put down an Amendment protesting against this increase. Heavy as have been the losses of traders during the past two years they would not object to the increased burden if the interests of the country demanded it, if there was a war or other great national calamity, for they know that the safety of the nation is essential to good trade. But this additional 1d. in the £1 has been put on to produce a mere £330,000. The reductions made on small incomes are so unimportant as not to be worthy of notice. By some process of jugglery the incomes under £500 a year may not have to pay more and even somewhat less with an Income Tax at 8d. than they had when it was at 7d.; but if it had been left at 7d. for all, there would not be so much to complain of, although the Conservative 6d. in peace time is ample. The Member for Islington has long endeavoured to obtain a different rate of taxation on incomes derived from personal exertion and on those arising from investment. He has tried again to-night, but without success. I agree with him entirely, but no such differentiation is to be found in the Government proposal or will be accepted by the Government. The tax under Schedule (D) extends to the profits of trades, professions, employments, or vocations carried on or exercised in the United Kingdom or elsewhere by persons residing in the United Kingdom. It is this tax, which the Member for Midlothian has represented as "an engine of gigantic power for great national purposes, but attended by circumstances in its operation which make it difficult, perhaps impossible, or at any rate not desirable, to maintain it as a portion of the permanent and ordinary finance."

Twenty years ago he contemplated its "total and absolute repeal." A tax upon home trade must be made as light as possible, and especially when that home trade is in the woeful plight of the present time. The last thing that should be contemplated is its increase save under dire necessity. This does not happily now exist, for £1,460,000 of the £1,780,000 the increased tax is to produce is simply given to assist other people to meet the 8d. tax. It is an unfair tax. It will entail, as the Member for Midlothian declared on Income Tax on trades generally,

"a considerable amount of trouble, sometimes such an amount as to constitute in itself a serious tax upon patience and time, difficulties which clearly ought not to be encountered except for the sake of a large benefit, and except on account of an imperious and absolute demand."

In his Budget speech for 1890 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, in reducing the Income Tax, said—

"The extra 2d. was imposed for a special purpose, at a special time, when there were special exigencies."

That "imperious and absolute demand," these "special exigencies," do not exist now. All must admit it is also a tax which works especially badly in times of bad trade, bad debts, short credit, and want of confidence. The Income Tax Commissioners discharge their duties well, but the instructions of the Board of Inland Revenue in 1874 are not always remembered as they should be. They said—

"The Board feel that they cannot too strongly express their disapprobation of any persons being charged on sums beyond their probable amount of income merely for the purpose of inducing them to appeal. The Commissioners make also known the provision in the law allowing an appeal to the Special Commissioners instead of to District Commissioners, the neighbours, and possibly rivals, of the taxpayer disputing the amount of the charge made upon him."

This is all very well, but an appeal to the Special Commissioners takes a great deal of time and a great deal of money. The great majority of traders are practically driven to disclose their affairs to their fellow townsmen. I am not saying the Income Tax Commissioners are not as a whole scrupulously honest and honourable men, but, rightly or wrongly, an impression is very prevalent that the exhibition of a falling trade and of heavy losses inflicts an irreparable blow on the local credit on which business is sustained. Little by little, the news oozes out, and is very prejudicial to the unfortunate individual, especially when the Income Tax Commissioners (who are appointed by the Land Tax Commissioners, and whose addresses and occupations are not even known to the Treasury) are managers and directors of local banks. Will they make no use of their knowledge if application is made for an advance or an overdraft? The Chancellor of the Exchequer himself admitted in his Financial Statement that the year 1893 was "an ill-starred year, attended by serious diminutions of income from agricultural depression, and shrinkage of dividends."

Colonel Howard Vincent

He had the whole House with him when he said—

"It is no use meddling with small taxes, which irritate and embarrass small traders without producing any considerable revenue."

What is this additional 1d. in the £1, to be levied upon traders, but an irritation and embarrassment to produce an insignificant amount—a mere £330,000. On his own arguments the right hon. Gentleman ought readily to accept this Amendment, the only one I have moved. The sum is so trifling that it will not affect the whole Budget, and it can be readily supplied, if essential, in many different ways. It is no part of my duty to show my right hon. Friend how he can best obtain the sum. There are many easy methods. I will name one. He has declared himself anxious in his Budget to make foreign and colonial property contribute its quota towards the taxation of the United Kingdom. He can by a mere Resolution of the House obtain this sum of £330,000, and more, from the foreigner, by a registration fee of only 10s. per £100 ad valorem on the £65,000,000 of goods coming from other countries, fully manufactured by foreign labour, to compete with British labour. Five per cent. on these goods would give him £3,250,000, and no one would feel it. That would be doing something that would be an instalment of that justice for labour, that justice which is denied it at the present time, and especially by the Liberal Party in Sheffield. I beg to move, therefore, that the "eightpence" proposed remain at the present amount of "sevenpence," in itself 1d. in the £1 too much, except in the case of war.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 39, to leave out the word "eightpence," and insert the word "sevenpence."—
(Colonel Howard Vincent.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'eightpence' stand part of the Clause."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that he found it difficult to treat the hon. and gallant Gentleman's Amendment seriously. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had obtained his heart's desire when the House of Commons had voted an increase of £4,000,000 in the sum to be spent upon the Navy, and he had no fault to find with his consistency, for he had voted against the Death Duties, the Beer Duty, and the Spirit Duty, and now he was going to vote against the Income Tax. Therefore, as far as the action of the hon. and gallant Member was concerned, the Government would be unable to obtain a single $\frac{1}{2}$ d. towards the £4,000,000 which the hon. and gallant Member was so anxious should be spent upon the Navy. He would also deprive incomes of below £500 a year of the allowance he (Sir W. Harcourt) proposed to give them. The allowance that was to be made under Schedule (A) was far larger than at present. The owners of small house property in Sheffield and elsewhere were going to get 16 per cent. The result of adopting this Amendment would be to deprive them of all this advantage. There was many a man whose income was largely invested in house property. Such a man would get the advantage of this abatement and also of the other abatement. He would get a double advantage—an advantage of which every one of these men was keenly sensitive, and of which every one of them was to be deprived by the Amendment of the hon. Member. He hoped the hon. Member would not persevere with an Amendment of this character, which he was quite sure would not receive the approval of the House.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not think that in supporting the Amendment the agricultural Members were taking the part of the millionaires. Those who represented the agricultural interest objected to the extra 1d. on the Income Tax because it fell directly on their backs, and they were not at all obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the abatement he gave them.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the hon. and gallant Member give that up?

MAJOR RASCH said, he would not, because he thought that half a loaf was better than no bread. The extra taxation was needed for strengthening the Navy. One of the primary uses of a strong and efficiency Navy was to guard the food supplies of the people. There was a population of 35,000,000 people in the British Isles, and there was only food enough to supply them for two months in the year. It was rather seething the kid in its mother's milk to ask the agricultural interest to pay for guarding the food supplies which were ruining that interest. He did not mean to say that the agriculturists at all objected to having an extra burden placed on their backs in order to increase the strength of the Navy; and he believed that if the right hon. Gentleman had charged them four times as much for obtaining an efficient Navy, not one of them would have grumbled. It was not for him (Major Rasch) to suggest means of increasing the Revenue to a gentleman who Lord Rosebery said the other day had risen at one bound to the first rank of European financiers; but he might say to the right hon. Gentleman that if he would put a duty on imported manufactured goods, inclusive of food stuffs, he would hand down his name to a posterity which would never forget him. On behalf of the agricultural interest he (Major Rasch) cordially supported the Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 123; Noes 16.—(Division List, No. 136.)

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, he now rose to move to omit the words "the duty of 4d." The clause would then run, "In England, Scotland, and Ireland the duty of 3d." As it stood in the Bill the English farmers would pay 4d., while the Scotch or Irish farmer was called on for 3d. only. His object was, of course, to place the English farmer on the same footing as the Scotch and Irish farmer. When Sir Robert Peel introduced the Income Tax in 1841 he intended to treat the English and Scotch farmer alike. Subsequently, however, he proposed this difference, presumably in consequence of pressure from Scotch Members. The statements made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to this subject had been conflicting. When he (Sir J. Lubbock) asked the question and moved an Amendment this year on the Budget Resolutions, the right hon. Gentleman was somewhat severe, and said he was the only man in the House who did not know. Everyone else, the right hon. Gentleman said, knew the answer.—

"The reason was that, whereas in Scotland and Ireland the tenant made the repairs, in England they were made by the landlord. It was as clear as two and two made four."

But when his right hon. Friend was asked the same question last year he did not know himself, for he said—

"I am ashamed to say I cannot answer the question as to the origin of the difference between the three countries; it is lost in antiquity. Whether it was the Treasury, or whether it originated in the Articles of the Union I do not know, but I should imagine it was founded upon some notion of difference in relation to prices in the various countries."

Last year, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman told them he did not know the reason himself. This year he said that he (Sir J. Lubbock), was the only man in the House who did not know the answer. Last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer supposed it was owing to some notion of difference in prices, this year it was because in England the landlord did the repairs. As regards last year's reason it is, of course, obvious that there could be no sufficient difference in prices between districts so near and, indeed, actually contiguous, as to justify the difference. This year the right hon. Gentleman told them that the reason was because in England the repairs were made by the landlord, while in Scotland and Ireland they were made by the tenant. But, as he had already pointed out, and as his right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) showed more in detail immediately afterwards, so far from this being a reason for charging the English farmer more than the Scotch and Irish, it would be a reason for charging the Scotch and Irish more than the English. Suppose a farm taken for £400 a year with repairs amounting to £100 done by the landlord. If, on the contrary, the arrangement had been that the tenant did the repairs, he would pay, say £300. While then under the English system the rent would be £400, under the Scotch it would be £300, the profit remaining the same. The English farmer ought, therefore, to pay a lower, not a higher, rate than the Scotch. But it must be admitted, on the other hand, that the difference in the Scotch law as to rates must also be taken into consideration. This tended to some extent in the other direction. Even, however, if the rates were allowed for, the English farmer would still be at a disadvantage. He did not, however, press this. What they asked was that all farmers, whether in England, Scotland, or Ireland, might be placed on the same footing and treated alike. He hoped in this Amendment for the support of the Welsh Members. He was not asking for any exemption on behalf of English farmers, but only asked that farmers in all the divisions of the country should be placed on the same footing. It was a simple act of justice, and he hoped it would not be refused by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Sir J. Lubbock

Amendment proposed, in page 18, line 4, to leave out the words "the duty of fourpence."—(Sir J. Lubbock.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR W. HARCOURT was understood to say that on the former occasion when the subject was brought forward he had promised that it should receive his careful attention, and he was willing to accept the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet. In making that concession, however, he hoped his right hon. Friend would recollect that he lost a considerable amount in the way of Revenue, and, therefore, that this concession would not be treated as a precedent for still further endeavouring to get concessions out of his pockets. The real truth was, that the farmer now whose rent was £300 a year paid nothing to the Income Tax, so that the assumption that this Amendment would relieve small farmers was all nonsense, and this was not a motion for the relief of the tenant farmers of England. If a man paid a rent of £800 a year he was rated for the Income Tax at £400, then he got an allowance of £160, so that even a man rented at £800 a year paid little or nothing to the Income Tax. This demand was made not on behalf of the farmers, but on behalf of the landowners who farmed their own land. They were the only people who really paid under the Schedule. The ordinary tenant-farmer of England paid nothing at all, and this Amendment was a measure of relief to the gentlemen who farmed their own land, and who would now get a reduction upon their Income Tax. That was really the only class who would benefit by this Amendment. A farmer whose rent was £300 a year would not pay a single farthing to the Income Tax. It had been said that this was a matter in which the Welsh farmers were also interested, but how many Welsh farmers were there who paid more than £300 a year? This was not going to be a benefit to that class at all, but to the landowners, and those who farmed farms of £1,000 a year. Those were the people who were going to benefit by this Amendment. As to the alleged inequalities affecting farmers in one particular county as compared with others, those inequalities were rather apparent than real. As he was going to make this concession he hoped his right hon. Friend the Member for the London University and his allies would defend him against any demands which might be made by Scotch and Irish Members for a reduction in their respective countries because of the reduction they had made in England. He hoped they would support him in this doctrine of equality of which they were to reap the advantage, and that having been robbed out of one pocket there would not be an attempt to rob him out of the other. He should accept the Amendment, and he could only hope that all the benefits which the right hon. Gentleman anticipated would be derived from it.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) was obliged to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for making this concession, but combated the right hon. Gentleman's statement that it would benefit not the farmers but the landlords. Those landlords who had farms in their own hands for the purpose of estate management would not benefit in any particular degree by it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Are there no landlords in England who have farms on their own hands?

MR. HENEAGE: Oh, then they are a deserving class, because the farms on their hands must be farms which they can get no farmers to take. I was speaking of those landlords who were in the position that they were not obliged to farm the land.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. RENSCHAW (Renfrew, W.) moved an Amendment to leave out "threepence," and insert "twopence," his object being to give relief to the agriculturists of Scotland in the matter of the Income Tax.

THE CHAIRMAN: This Amendment would not be in Order, as the Committee have decided that the duties shall be equal in England, Scotland, and Ireland.

MR. RENSCHAW: I desire to point out that the matter was put separately, and the duty in England has been passed at threepence. ["No."]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member does not appear to appreciate what has taken place. The clause now runs that in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively the duty shall be threepence, therefore the Committee have already decided that England, Scotland, and Ireland are to pay a duty of threepence.

MR. RENSCHAW: Then I shall venture to move to leave out "Scotland and Ireland."

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes, that would be in Order.

MR. RENSCHAW then formally moved to leave out of the clause the words "Scotland and Ireland." He said, it did seem to him that if his Amendment were not accepted a great injustice would be done in regard to Scotland. He examined the conditions under which the English and Scotch farmers respectively held, and he pointed out that in 1842 Sir Robert Peel, speaking on this very subject, pointed out that the peculiarity of the case was this: that in Scotland the local charges were generally borne by the landlord, and in England by the tenant. That constituted the reason why a distinction was made in the Act of 1806, and Sir Robert Peel said he readily admitted that it would not be quite fair to tax the tenants of the two countries in precisely the same ratio. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was now, however, proposing to fix the same ratio for the two countries, and in doing that he would be doing a great injustice to the Scottish farmers who, on account of the difference in the conditions of their tenancies by which the local charges were borne by the landlord, had to pay a heavier rent than their English brethren, and would consequently feel this taxation all the more. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to agree to the reduction of the charge which he now proposed.

Amendment proposed, in page 18, line 5, to leave out the words "Scotland and Ireland respectively."—(Mr. Renshaw.)

SIR W. HARCOURT expressed the hope that the right hon. Baronet the Member for the London University was now satisfied with the work he had done. As he (Sir W. Harcourt) anticipated, it was absolutely impossible to satisfy the landlords, whether in England, Scotland, or Ireland. Non missura cutem nisi plena cruoris hirudo. They were like the daughters of the horse-leech. Their cry was "Give, give, give," and the more that was given the more they asked. He need not say that he should refuse this fresh demand.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK said, the right hon. Gentleman asked him, if he was satisfied with what had just been done, to support the Government against any such Amendment as that now proposed, and he certainly trusted that it would not be pressed. The right hon. Gentleman had equalised the matter, and he hoped, therefore, the hon. Gentleman would not think it necessary to press the Amendment to a Division.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) felt a certain sympathy with his hon. Friend who had moved this Amendment. It seemed to him that since they had left the Death Duties the whole vitality of the Debate had departed, and the only remaining life left was that which related to Scotch whisky and Scotch landlords. British spirits had been flattened down, as had also Irish whisky; therefore, when he did see vitality imported into the Debate, even by Scotch landlords, he could not help sympathising with the hon. Member who brought forward the matter. He felt, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made an important concession, and he did not think that this was the appropriate moment to press him further. Under these circumstances, he would add his humble appeal to his hon. Friend not to press his Amendment to a Division.

MR. MALLOCK (Devonshire, Torquay) considered that the grievance which the Scotch Members complained of was not so great as they endeavoured to make out, and an examination of the figures would show that the Scotch farmer really only paid Income Tax upon exactly the same amount as did the English farmer.

*SIR H. MAXWELL (Wigton) said, that several English Members, the Chancellor of the Exchequer included, expressed some surprise that those who represented the Scottish farmers did not feel deeply grateful for the concessions offered to the English farmers. Of course, they were very glad that the English farmers should be placed in a better position. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said they would not by the Amendment be put in a better position, but the general impression seemed to be against this view of the right hon. Gentleman, and that a concession had been granted to the English farmers.

SIR W. HARCOURT: English gentlemen.

SIR H. MAXWELL: Well—English farmers may be English gentlemen. I do not wish to make invidious distinctions, but there are farmers of all classes.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I meant English landlords.

*SIR H. MAXWELL said, the right hon. Gentleman claimed there had been a concession in favour of the English agriculturists. Was there any particular reason why the Scotch agriculturists should be grateful for that? He should like to point out that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was wiping out at this moment the distinction which had been recognised by his predecessors since 1806 as a just and fair one. It did seem to him that some better reasons should be given than had yet been for depriving Scotch farmers of the consideration that had been shown by former Chancellors of the Exchequer. This was not an appeal on behalf of the Scotch landlords, but on behalf of the Scotch farmers; and the Member for Renfrewshire and himself were entering a protest against the abolition of a distinction which had so long been recognised as just and fair as between the Scotch and English farmers.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) said, he hoped the hon. Member would not go to a Division on the Amendment. Agriculture in all parts of England had suffered great depression ; and the farmers had now got from the Chancellor of the Exchequer a concession—not a very large concession, and a concession which applied only to large farmers—but at the same time it was a concession ; and it was evident the Chancellor of the Exchequer yielded it only under very great pressure.

SIR W. HARCOURT : No.

MR. DODD : I said that, because the speech of the right hon. Gentleman did not show any eagerness in granting the concession.

SIR W. HARCOURT : I made the concession willingly, but the hon. Member does not seem to be grateful for it.

*MR. DODD said, he accepted the concession with thankfulness on behalf of the farmers of his constituency, some of whom it would relieve. The smallest concession to agriculturists was accepted with gratitude at the present time. With regard to the distinction between Scotch and English farmers, the fact that a higher tax had been in the past imposed on England than on Scotland and Ireland hardly seemed to be a good reason for the present difference in treatment. He therefore appealed to the hon. Member for Renfrewshire not to grudge English farmers this concession, and to postpone his demand on behalf of the Scotch farmers to another occasion, when, unless substantial reason against it was shown, it would be the duty and the pleasure of English Members to support it.

MR. BIDDULPH (Herefordshire, Ross) said he, for one, thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what he had done. At the present time the only farmers who made any profit were the Scotch and Irish, and he therefore thought they had no right to complain. If things should change ; if the farmers of England should make a profit, while the farmers of Scotland were working at a loss, then the balance would be redressed ; but at present he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed to a Division.

MR. RENSHAW said, that he should certainly take the opinion of the Committee on the Amendment. It was a question on which there would be very strong feeling throughout Scotland.

MR. BARTLEY said, that he could not support the Amendment, and he regretted that it should have been moved after the concession which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made to the English farmers. There was no reason why Scotch farmers should have an advantage over English farmers. The fact that the English farmers had got a certain small concession did not injure the Scotch farmers in any way ; and he thought it a pity that they on the Opposition side should show any disagreement on this particular point. With regard to the disagreement between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his followers, that was a matter that gave them amusement, and as to which of them was right he did not much care. But he hoped his hon. Friend would not divide, for he would find very few would support him.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, that the distinction which had so long existed between the taxation on the English farmer and that on the Scotch and Irish farmer was founded on the highest financial authority. There were sound reasons for it which had not ceased to exist. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had to-night suddenly altered the distinction, so as to make the tax equal between the farmers of the Three Countries, whose circumstances were very different. He felt that Ireland was disadvantaged by the change. He noted, when they came to the question of the allowances made in respect to the Income Tax, that whilst England got five-sixths of the proceeds of the additional 1d., Ireland only got six-sevenths. Ireland, which raised £74,000, only got back £31,000. The farmers of Ireland would, therefore, be at a double disadvantage. The Irish farmers would have to pay the same Income Tax as the English farmers ; but while England received back the bulk of the additional 1d., Ireland received less than one-half. He thought that unjust, and he intended to support the Amendment.

MR. HENEAGE thought that it was an extraordinary occasion for the Scotch and Irish farmers to raise a grievance. Last year was the worst which English agriculturists had had since 1877, while in Ireland and Scotland it was one of the best they had ever had. Last year they had not a bit of hay in England, while in Scotland and Ireland the crop was abundant and was sold at very high prices.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK pointed out that this concession to the English farmer did not alter the position of the Scotch and Irish farmer at all. The Scotch and Irish farmers would not have to pay one farthing of taxation more than they paid now. The concession simply placed all on the same footing. It was now admitted that there was no reason for the inequality between the treatment of English and Irish and Scotch farmers which had existed so long.

*MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich) said, that this year very few Essex farmers would have paid under Schedule B; however, for many years English farmers had been asking what the reason was for the different treatment given to them and to Scotch and Irish farmers, and they had never got a satisfactory answer. Now the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put the matter right, and he, for one, thanked the right hon. Gentleman.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 156 ; Noes 31.—(Division List, No. 137.)

MR. BIDDULPH moved an Amendment to provide that in the case of woods kept in the hands of the owner Income Tax should not be levied under Schedule (B). He said that woods paid 50 per cent. more than other property by being taxed under Schedule (A) and under Schedule (B). There was no reason for this so far as he could see, except that it was an oversight when woods were originally rated. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not stop at the concession he had just made, but would go a step further and do this act of justice to owners of woods.

Amendment proposed, in page 18, line 5, after the word "threepence," to insert the words—

"Provided that in the case of woods which are kept in the hands of the owner Income Tax shall not be levied under Schedule B."—(Mr. Biddulph.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT : I am afraid I have now got to the end of my concessions. This is not asked for in the interests of the farmers of any country ; it is a proposal to remit one-half the taxation to which woods are now subjected, and I cannot assent to it.

MR. BIDDULPH : I must divide the Committee, as it is a matter of importance.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 84 ; Noes 123.—(Division List, No. 138.)

MR. DARLING said, the Amendment he desired to move was one designed to remedy a wrong that was felt to press hardly on a large and deserving class of people. He desired to add—

"The income of any married woman shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be her own separate income, and she shall be chargeable with Income Tax thereon as though she were actually sole and unmarried."

It would astonish a good many Members to know that, though the Married Women's Property Act was passed under which what a woman might earn was her own property, and she might have the spending of it when assessed for the Income Tax, she was not assessed in her own name, and the assessment was not a separate one on her own property. The husband and the wife were assessed together, though their incomes might be separate and earned in different businesses. The assessment was on the husband, notwithstanding that the wife had power to dispose of her own income as she thought proper. The husband was assessed just as though the income of his wife were his own income. If the income of the wife was taken, as it ought to be, as separate from that of the husband, in many cases both of them would be entitled to a large abatement or be completely exempt. By uniting their incomes a married woman was deprived of a relief which was given to a single woman. He would call attention to the Statute under which this tax was levied. In the Act of 1842, 5 and 6 Victoria, chap. 35, Section 45, were contained these words—

'The profits of any married woman living with her husband shall be deemed the profits of the husband and the same shall be charged in the name of the husband, and not in her name or of her trustees.'

Since that Act was passed the Married Women's Property Act had been placed on the Statute Book, which had placed the property of married women on an entirely different basis. Women now had powers concerning their property which were undreamed of when the Act of 1842 was passed. It was perfectly right to impose the tax on the husband in those days, as he had the spending of the wife's money; but the Married Women's Property Act had altered that. The law which treated the incomes of husband and wife as two separate incomes now lumped them together for the purposes of assessment. Take the case of a bachelor earning £2 a week marrying a woman with an income of £60 a year. If they remained unmarried neither income was taxed; but if they married, the husband paid a tax on £42, although the wife's income remained at her own disposal. That was a case which, on principle, the right hon. Gentleman would find it difficult to defend. Take another example: A bachelor with an income of £300 married a woman with an income of £220 a year. Before marriage the husband paid Income Tax on £180—under the present Bill the sum would be £140—and the wife on £100. Together they would pay on £240. But after the marriage the husband alone was assessable on an income of £520. He ventured to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on behalf of these people. From letters he had received, and from what he had heard from people who came to lay their case before him, this was not a concession asked for on behalf of landlords or of idle and rich people; it was asked for on behalf of a very industrious section of the middle-class community. A common case was that of school teachers—who had become very numerous during recent years. Not unnaturally it frequently happened that a schoolmaster married the mistress of a neighbouring school, the result being that they lost the abatement they had been receiving in the Income Tax assessment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was fertile in expedients, might suggest means by which the couple could avoid the increased assessment. No doubt they could avoid it, but the means had not occurred to them at present. On the ground of good finance there did not seem to be any reason against the concession asked for, and on the ground of morality there seemed every reason for it.

Amendment proposed, in page 18, line 5, at end to insert the words,—

"The income of any married woman shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be her own separate income, and she shall be chargeable with Income Tax thereon as though she were actually sole and unmarried."—(Mr. Darling.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR W. HARCOURT said, he quite felt that there were many cases which would come under this Amendment which demanded sympathy. But, on the other hand, there were cases which no one would care to see come under it. For instance, take the case of a husband and wife, each with an income of £500. Though the joint income was £1,000 a year, each of them would get an abatement. Take, again, the case of a man with a little over £500 a year who had a wife with no money at all. He would get no abatement; so that the joint menage with £1,000 a year would receive two abatements, while the other establishment with half the income would get none. If a woman with an income of £400 or £500 a year married a man with £10,000 a year she would be allowed an abatement under the Amendment. This was one of the consequences of the Amendment which would not be reasonable. The hon. and learned Gentleman made no distinction between incomes. He talked of the hard earnings of the schoolmaster—a case deserving of every sympathy—but he did not confine his Amendment to that class. There was one argument he (Sir W. Harcourt) was bound to use—and he was sorry to have to urge this plea so often. He had already proposed to give realty £700,000, and he had given relief to the extent of £800,000 to people whose incomes were under £500 a year. The Amendment did not, however, limit these concessions to people of small incomes. He had asked the officers of the Inland Revenue to make a calculation, and they informed him that the concession proposed in the Amendment would involve a loss of at least £500,000 a year, and more probably £750,000. Under these circumstances, it was, of course, impossible for him to accept the Amendment.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he could not help remarking that the objections of the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not meet the case, which they were entitled to press. He would be glad to know what were the instructions given to the officers of the Inland Revenue on which they based their estimate of loss mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman. Did the right hon. Gentleman indicate to them that in cases where the husband possessed upwards of £1,000 a year and the wife £200 or £300 exemptions should not apply? Did he impose limits on the estimate which would exclude cases which he (Sir R. Webster) admitted frankly did not call for redress? There were, however, cases amongst hard-working classes of the community in regard to which it was fair to say that the way the Income Tax was levied now pressed unduly hard on them. Take the workers in the musical profession, for instance—the people who taught the piano or the fiddle. A husband might earn £250 a year, and the wife something in the same proportion. Or, take the case of teachers in schools of a rather higher grade. In many cases both the husband and wife were bread-winners. In cases like this he submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that his objection did not apply. In cases where joint incomes ranged between £600 and £750 it would be only an act of simple justice that the concession proposed in the Amendment should apply. He did not believe the loss to the Exchequer would largely exceed £100,000. The right hon. Gentleman's estimate of £500,000 was an extravagant one. He ventured on behalf of the poorer classes to urge the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accept the Amendment in a modified form, fixing the joint income exempted at £750.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had put the matter from a very different point of view from the Mover of the Amendment. The estimate which he obtained from the Inland Revenue was, of course, based upon the Amendment, but the hon. and learned Gentleman asked that the exemption should be confined to a very moderate sum. He had had no opportunity of considering the question in that aspect, and, without making any definite pledge, would before Report consider whether some exemption of the kind could be made.

MR. ARCHIBALD GROVE (West Ham, N.) said, he put down an Amendment a short time ago dealing with the earnings of a married woman when they did not exceed £160 per annum, and he was glad that he had been anticipated to a certain extent by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was a fact that the Amendment before the House would have the result that if a woman earning £150 a year married a man with £20,000 a year her income would escape paying Income Tax, and that certainly would not have the sympathy of even the greatest plutocrat in the House; but, on the other hand, the Amendment as amended would greatly assist those whose cause he was advocating—namely, schoolmasters and schoolmistresses who were striving hard to make a living. If a schoolmaster and a schoolmistress each earning £120 a year married, the Chancellor of the Exchequer immediately put a tax on them; whereas if they chose to dispense with the ceremony their incomes would remain unabated. That was a very undesirable state of affairs. He proposed formally to move the Amendment standing in his name.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I hope the hon. Member will not move the Amendment. I have already stated that I am willing to consider the point. I wish to have an opportunity of looking into the figures.

*MR. LODER (Brighton) said, he supposed that they must be thankful for small mercies. He was sorry the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not seen his way to accept his hon. Friend's Amendment in its entirety, and he felt bound to say a few words on the subject, because more teachers were to be found possibly in his constituency than in any other constituency in the United Kingdom. Under the old Common Law husband and wife were regarded as one, and their incomes were assessed together; but that was altered under the Married Women's Property Act. It was not known to this day on what principle the Income Tax Commissioners assessed the income of a married woman as part of the income of her husband since the Married Women's Property Act was passed. The principle of the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to be to treat the husband and wife in one way so long as it suited his purpose, and then to throw over the principle as soon as he saw that he ceased to derive any benefit from it. He would like to give an example of what might possibly occur, so as to illustrate, as it forcibly did, the necessity of some such Amendment as this. He would take, for instance, the cases of a man and a woman each of whom had a separate income of £159 a year. As long as they remained unmarried they were exempt from the Income Tax, but if they married their incomes were aggregated, and they were subjected to a tax of £6 12s. a year. Again, if they each had £400 a year they would only have to pay tax on £280 if single, but if married the charge would be £26 13s. 4d., instead of about £18. He thought it was extremely hard in these hard times to impose these additional heavy taxes on people at the very moment when their expenses were increasing and likely to increase.

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) said, he had heard with very great satisfaction the second statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because from the first statement he had feared that the right hon. Gentleman's disposition to make concessions had become exhausted, at any rate for that night. It was a wonder to him that the anomaly had remained so long. The Amendment seemed to be simply a corollary to the Married Women's Property Acts. The Acts of 1870 and 1883 established in the most complete and absolute manner the separate position of married women in regard to property, but the clause in the Income Tax of 1842 was directly in the teeth of those Acts. He hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would find it comparatively easy to adopt the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. All that those who supported the Amendment desired was to bring Income Tax law into harmony with the general law as to married women's property.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) expressed a hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would see his way to make the benefit as large as possible, at any rate in the case of persons with small incomes. He reminded the right hon. Gentleman of an appeal which he made to him on that point on a previous occasion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he had listened with great interest and not a little amusement to the course of the Debate, which he supposed was about to be brought to an end, and especially to the reply of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the perfectly clear and logical arguments made use of by the hon. and learned Member for Deptford. The right hon. Gentleman had declined to consider the Amendment on its merits, and stated that it would be too expensive, and, in short, not one which he could look at for a moment. The hon. Member for the Isle of Wight then offered a suggestion to meet the difficulty, and said that he himself would be quite content with something smaller than that was asked for in the Amendment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer thereupon seemed delighted, and, without advancing any new arguments or touching in any way on the merits of the clause, said he would readily consider the proposal before the Report stage. That might be, therefore, regarded by his hon. and learned Friends as a concession, and, after all, it was not so important to have one's arguments met in a fair spirit as to get one's way allowed in the long run.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That is not a very gracious way of dealing with a concession.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he would explain why he had adopted that course. He had watched throughout the whole of the Debate the principles which the Government held as subsisting between the relation of man and wife. That relationship involved many important social questions which bore directly upon legislation, and he found that the view the Government took of the matter was that when they considered it would be profitable for the Exchequer to consider a man and wife as one then they were considered as one. On the other hand, when it was to the advantage of the Revenue to consider them as two distinct persons, then husband and wife were considered to be two distinct persons. The Government had proposed to raise money chiefly from two sources—Income Tax and the Death

Duties. For the purposes of calculating the Income Tax husband and wife were considered as one; for the purpose of the Death Duties two. The reason for that anomaly was obvious when it was remembered that all property belonging to the husband or wife was, on being inherited by the survivor, to be treated as acquired property, and to pay Succession Duty accordingly. Could any system be more absurd, more indefensible, more unjust? He believed that a more unjust plan had never been devised by the ingenuity of any Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had reproached him for not meeting his concessions half-way. He preferred, however, to meet them in the same spirit as they had been made. He hoped that it would not for a moment be thought that he himself considered that the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend went one whit beyond a logical conclusion. He did not contend that in the case of large incomes the concession asked for would be worth much, but for all that he should not advise his hon. Friend to push for a further concession being allowed in the case of larger estate. The appetite and greed for taxation, whether to be derived from the Income Tax or from the new Death Duties, seemed to have placed Government in a position so utterly irrational and indefensible that the Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared quite unable to resist any opportunity of increasing his revenue by any means that chanced to turn up and exacting the last farthing that could be claimed. The right hon. Gentleman was always claiming for his Budget that for the first time it put the taxation of the country on a rational and fair basis, but he hoped on the present occasion the right hon. Gentleman would not consider him again ungrateful if, while sympathising with his financial necessities, he urged him to consider the justice of giving some relief in the case placed before his notice by the Amendment, which he hoped it would not be necessary to press to a Division.

MR. DARLING said, he would not think of putting the Committee to the trouble of a Division under the circumstances. He only wished it to be thoroughly understood that the principle of the Amendment would find its way into the Bill in some shape or form, it being left open to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to decide up to what limit these exemptions should be allowed. On that understanding he asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not accept that view. I said I would consider the question, and whether it was possible to introduce the principle to a limited degree. To that I still adhere.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 30 agreed to.

Clause 31.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT inquired if the Government proposed in this clause to introduce words making it more clear that the benefit of the one-sixth abatement was not to be limited to cases where the tax was charged on and paid by the occupier. Those more competent than himself to judge thought the words "or landlord" should be inserted after "occupier" in line 4 of the clause, as that would avoid any dispute between owners of cottage property and the Income Tax Commissioners.

MR. R. T. REID said, he had down an Amendment which would meet the case.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT said, he would not, under those circumstances, press his suggestion.

Amendment proposed, in page 19, line 1, to leave out from the words "occupier" to "the," in line 2, and insert the words "or by the owner or landlord of a dwelling-house under the third rule No. IV. of the said Section 60."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge) said, he had to move an Amendment the object of which was to extend to tithe-owners the application of the provision as to the reduction of assessments for the purpose of collection by one-tenth. Tithes had from early times occupied the same position as land for all purposes of rating and taxation. If, therefore, landowners were to have an allowance of 10 per cent. in connection with the payment of Income Tax, it was only fair and just that the same benefit should be given to tithe-owners. Tithe-owners were subjected to heavy charges and outgoings as well as the landowner. He was sorry to notice that, in answer to a question on this point, the Chancellor of the Exchequer on April 26 said tithe was not to be granted the benefit of the reduction, and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to state his reasons for that decision. Was it because tithes were not liable to such heavy outgoings as land in respect of repairs? Tithe-owners would have to pay on the gross nominal value of their tithes, although they were subjected to heavy charges as well as the landowners. It might be said that the landowner had to repair his farms, but the clergyman had to pay out large sums on account of his cure—for his schools and for an assistant clergyman frequently. He regarded it as very extraordinary that now for the first time this distinction should be drawn for taxing purposes between land and tithes. He would submit, moreover, that no body of men in the country were more heavily rated and taxed than the clergy were at the present time. A friend of his, who had carefully inquired into this matter, had assured him that the clergy paid generally in rates and taxes upwards of 30 per cent. of their income. They were told that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a loyal and devoted son of the Church, and he could assure him that he could do nothing better in the interests of the Church than to relieve the clergy of a portion of the taxation which at present fell on them most unfairly.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the Amendment was quite inadmissible and not at all relative to the subject-matter of this discussion. He was surprised that the hon. Gentleman, as a great champion of the Church, was not aware that an assistant clergyman's stipend was deducted from the gross income. They were dealing here with an allowance to be made to people who were taxed upon the gross rental, the total of which they did not receive. That was not in the least applicable to the owner of tithe-rent, who had not the outgoings which the landowners had. The clergy, doubtless, was not a rich body; they were very hard-working, and certainly a very deserving class of men, but that was no reason why they should be put upon a footing with respect to this taxation to which they had no title at all. There was no resemblance between the cases of the landowner and the tithe-owner, and the appeal made by the hon. Member was altogether inapplicable. Therefore, he could not assent to the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. NEWDIGATE (Warwickshire, Nuneaton) moved, in page 19, line 15, to leave out from "he," to "and," in line 6, and insert "on the net profits derivable from an estate." He said, if he understood aright, the great object of this Finance Bill was to equalise the Death Duties on real and personal property. If those duties were to be so equalised, he ventured to urge that the Income Tax ought also to be equalised on both kinds of property. He failed to understand why trade should enjoy such a number of exemptions as compared with land. Exemptions were allowed for the repair of trade premises, the repair of implements, bad and doubtful debts. Landowners had to look upon their properties as business in the same way, and buildings had to be kept in repair, and estate repairs thoroughly well executed. He should like to quote some cases in the practical working of an estate supplied to him by Mr. Walter Evans, a land agent in Warwickshire. One was the instance of a purely agricultural estate consisting of 1,270 acres. The annual gross receivable rent amounted to £1,500 a year; the average rent per acre was 23s. 7d. The outgoings were—assessed taxes, £126 a year; tithes, £14 8s. 3d.; parish rates, £6 14s. 4d.; insurance, £9 17s. 9d., making a total of £157 0s. 4d., or 10½ per cent. of the income of the property. The other case was an estate of almost entirely small holdings, consisting of 2,200 acres. Annual gross receivable rent, £4,200 a year; average rent per acre, about 38s. 4d.; taxes, tithes, rates, and insurance, £525 4s. 4d., or 12 1-3 per cent. of the income. The maintenance of gates and fences, and other estate repairs, could not be done for less than 20 per cent. of the gross rental, and then only with very good management. One more fact was even more conclusive. Mr. Smythe, of Birmingham, a well-known solicitor, who had the management of several estates in Warwickshire, had given him the figures of one estate in which the gross income came to £3,589 5s. 10d., while the net income only amounted to £2,373 19s. 7½d.—that was to say, £1,215 had to be spent upon it yearly. He could not do better than quote the words of a former Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Childers, who, speaking on April 30, 1885, said—

“I have a suggestion to throw out, to farmers”

(and if to farmers then he failed to see why not to landowners, too)

“which I should be glad if the House of Commons would consider, and it is this—that instead of being charged Income Tax on an arbitrary amount having relation to their rent, why should not farmers pay, like every other man, upon their net profits?”

Amendment proposed, in page 19, line 5, to leave out the words “reduced by a sum equal to one-tenth part thereof,” and insert the words “assessed on the net profits derivable from an estate.”—(Mr. Newdigate.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘reduced by a sum’ stand part of the Clause.”

SIR W. HARCOURT* was sure the Committee had heard with satisfaction the able statement the hon. Member had laid before the Committee with so much perspicacity and modesty. Whereas, however, the plan of the Bill was to keep the present assessment as it was, and upon that to make an allowance, the hon. Member proposed shortly to do away altogether with the present assessment under Schedule (A) and substitute for it a system of assessment under Schedule (D). The Government could not agree to that, because under Schedule (A) there were eight millions of assessment. Each separate tenement was so assessed under Schedule (A), and if the Amendment were carried out it would be necessary for the Inland Revenue authorities to enter into a particular separate assessment of eight millions of tenements in this country. The Inland Revenue authorities could not possibly cope with a business of that character. They must take the gross rental as it was and from it make a fixed deduction, arriving as best they could at a fair result. There was another practical objection to the proposed plan. The great security for the collection of the Income Tax was that it was collected at the source. It was of the greatest importance that that principle should be maintained if the Income Tax was not to break down. The two reasons he had given were conclusive. They took the gross rental, and on that made a deduction such as they would determine to be just when they considered the matter. The Government must adhere to the plan of the Bill and continue the form of assessment subject to the deduction to be made. The Government will not enter upon so complete a revolution as it would be to attempt to put Schedule (A) upon the same basis as Schedule (D).

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The right hon. Gentleman has given two reasons for refusing the Amendment, and I am bound to say that, though there may be difficulties in carrying it out, the reply of the right hon. Gentleman will be but cold comfort to my hon. Friend and the interests he represents. The right hon. Gentleman appears to have ignored altogether, and forgotten as if it did not exist, what many of us believe to be the great injustice inflicted upon owners of certain descriptions of real property by maintaining the system of assessment which he proposes still to continue to rely on. The present mode of assessing Income Tax with regard to agricultural land has always been acknowledged to be a grievance. The grievance has never been denied, and the only justification for it up to now has been the method in which land has been treated in regard to the Death Duties. That has now been removed by this Bill, and it is admitted that it would be impossible to continue the present mode of assessment without some modification. The right hon. Gentleman has suggested that our grievance would be sufficiently met by the reduction of the assessment upon the land to the extent of 1-10th, and I acknowledge, with such gratitude as that proposal deserves, that it is a step—at all events, that it is a step—in recognition of the grievances of which we complain. But what I desire to put to the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of a great number of representatives of the landed interest is this: that the concession is not by any means enough in regard to some parts of the country, and that it is worth in some districts practically nothing at all. I must ask you to remember where it was that this amount was taken from according to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he first introduced his Bill to the notice of the House. In dealing with this question he told us that the Government had been guided by precedents he found to exist in Lancashire and certain parts of Yorkshire also. I asked at the time, and I ask again, on what grounds Lancashire and Yorkshire were selected for dealing with this question?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I mentioned a great many other parts too.

MR. CHAPLIN: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman did. I have no recollection of it. I hope he will give us further information on that point before the Debate comes to a conclusion. Whereas in a great part of England agricultural depression exists now in a degree for which there has never been any precedent in the past, in Lancashire you have a district that happens to be almost the only district where there is no such depression. The condition of Lancashire, and the part of Yorkshire to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, cannot be taken as a criterion of what is just and necessary in other parts of the country. The right hon. Gentleman's great objection to the proposal of my hon. Friend is that it is entirely contrary to the plan of the Bill. If the proposal made is contrary to the plan of the Bill, so much the worse for the Bill that it does not contemplate justice and fairness. Take an instance which will prove conclusively that the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer are not sufficient to relieve us of a grievance which we have always felt in the past and which, after the passing of this Bill, we shall feel with renewed and greater intensity. I would submit a concrete instance. Take an estate of 20,000 acres which in ordinary times would bring in £20,000 a year, but which now brings in £4,000 a year—an amount carefully estimated by gentlemen of experience and knowledge on this subject with whom I have consulted. It is not at all an uncommon occurrence to find that land which yielded £1 an acre 10 years ago has fallen in value to 5s. When hon. Members have had the opportunity of studying all the evidence that has recently been given before the Agricultural Commission they will find that these cases exist in hundreds. What does that mean? The right hon. Gentleman says he is going to give relief to this property to the extent of 1-10th of the income. But here the available income is only £4,000 a year, and that sum, in the opinion of representative men of business, must be absolutely expended in necessary outgoings. Therefore, under your proposals—your liberal proposals, as you think them—the position is that in hundreds of cases the unfortunate owners of land are going to be charged 9-10ths of an Income Tax on an income which they actually never receive. I say that is a case which deserves the attention of the Government, and which is not to be met by the simple, bald, statement on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the proposal we make for getting rid of the existing injustice is in opposition to the plan of the Bill. If the Amendment would remove an injustice then the plan of the Bill ought to be altered. The duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as he had told them himself, was to equalise the tax and to see that those who were called on to pay taxation should only be called on in proportion to their ability to pay. There is a good deal more I should like to say, but I am physically incapable. The statement I have made, however, is one that represents the feeling of a vast number of agriculturists throughout the country, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will endeavour in some way to meet our views on the question.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down was scarcely justified in the strong language he used with respect to the proposed reduction in the Bill. He asked where the proposal came from. My answer is, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer took various counties and districts all over the country—not Lancashire alone. Some of these counties were urban and some rural. Therefore, I think he was justified in putting into the Bill the proportions of one-tenth and one-sixth that are given for reductions for land and for houses respectively. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sleaford quoted the case of an estate of 20,000 acres, the rent of which was formerly £1 an acre and now only 5s. In such a case the gross assessment will have to be reduced accordingly.

MR. CHAPLIN : I intended to point out that, however much the rental is reduced, the outgoings remain the same. They are in some cases even greater than they were in consequence of the depression.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : One portion of the right hon. Gentleman's argument had reference to the great reductions in rent. No doubt the gross value cannot be maintained at the original rent. You must bring down the gross value either by the Assessment Committee or the Income Tax authorities to the new rent. As to outgoings, looking at the deductions made by Assessment Committees in various parts of the country for rating purposes you will find that in many instances they are not so much as those proposed in the Bill.

MR. W. LONG said, the assessments the right hon. Gentleman was talking about were those made by Assessment Committees for local rate purposes. They were different to the assessments under the Bill.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : They are not so different as some people suppose. All these things have to be considered in connection with the way property is valued by different Assessment Committees all through the country. The valuation of the Metropolis is arrived at in a different way to that in other parts of the country. It is done under a special Act of Parliament, which fixes the deductions; but there is an important feature to be observed with reference to the Metropolis. I find that the gross value fixed by the Income Tax Commissioners and by the Assessment Committees in London is exactly the same—namely, £35,500,000. In the rest of England and Wales there is a great difference between the gross value as assessed by the Income Tax Commissioners, which is £129,176,000, and that by the Assessment Committees, which is only £122,157,000. The cause of the difference between the gross value as fixed by the Local Authorities in the country and by the Income Tax Commissioners is, I am informed, that the gross value in the country cannot be depended upon, as I think we ought to look at what is done in really rural counties. I have ascertained what are the deductions made from gross to obtain rateable value in several agricultural counties. I find that in Norfolk the gross value of land and houses is £2,670,000, and the rateable value is £2,273,000, the percentage of deduction being 14·9. That is slightly higher than the deduction made in the Bill. In Suffolk the gross value is £1,937,000, and the rateable value £1,679,000, the percentage of deduction being 14·3. In Somerset the gross value is £3,538,000, and the rateable value £3,074,000, the percentage of deduction being 13·1, or really less than that taken in the Bill. The deduction taken in the Bill is 10 per cent. on land and 16½ per cent. on houses, amounting altogether to something between 14 and 15 per cent.—I think it is 14·5 per cent. I mention these facts to show that the deductions we have made are not really very different from those that are made by Assessment Committees in agricultural counties. I will now take Lancashire. I see that my right hon. Friend opposite seems to think that Lancashire is not a proper case to quote. I am certainly happy to think that agricultural depression does not exist to any considerable extent in Lancashire, but I think I am justified in quoting that county. In Lancashire the county rate deduction made upon land without buildings is 8½ per cent., which is less than we take in our Bill, whilst on buildings, and on railways, and other works it is 16½. The West Riding, like Lancashire, is of rather an urban character, but it has agricultural land within it. In the West Riding county rate assessment 7½ per cent. is deducted from land and farm buildings, whilst the deduction made on dwelling houses of £6 and upwards is 15 per cent. These two important counties, therefore, make smaller deductions than are proposed in the Bill. I have also figures for another agricultural county—namely, Berkshire—where for county rate purposes from land without buildings only 2½ per cent. is deducted; from land and buildings together a deduction of 10 per cent. is made, and from houses there is a deduction of 20 per cent. Then I have Norfolk, which is, of course, an agricultural county. There they take 9½ per cent. off for land with buildings on it, 2½ per cent. off for land without buildings, and about 16 per cent. for houses. I think that the counties I have referred to may fairly be regarded in the light of guides.

Sir J. T. Hilbert

to us in this matter. I think that if any authority is needed for the proposal made in our Bill we may quote the cases of some of these large counties. If the County Rate and Assessment Committees do not make greater deductions than those that are made in the Bill, is there, I would ask, any real argument that can be used to show that greater deductions ought to be made? It appears to me that if you have an all-round deduction such as is proposed in the Bill for land and for houses, though it may cause hardship in some counties, it is, taking it all round, a satisfactory way of dealing with the question. I will just deal for one moment with the point raised by the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdigate). He wishes to have the assessment made on the net profits derivable from an estate. No doubt it would be a very good thing if you could have that done, but I say that the proposal is not feasible. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt) told us just now that there are 8,000,000 assessments under Schedule (A). No Department could possibly deal singly with 8,000,000 assessments. There are only about 500,000 cases under Schedule (D) in which each case is considered individually.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: How many are there under Schedule (D)?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: There are 550,000, according to the Return I have had given to me. Of course, I will not vouch for the entire accuracy of the Return. I should like to say a word or two upon the effect of the remissions upon different kinds of property. It looks as if those who are interested in land are rather inclined to look a gift horse in the mouth. They are not satisfied with the amount proposed to be given as a deduction. I should like to show the effect of the deduction of 10 per cent. upon agricultural land in a case in which the landlord does the repairs to buildings. In the case of a rent of £200 a year, the year allowance would be 10 per cent., or £20, and the duty, therefore, charged would be on £180. I could refer to other cases, but I will only say now that I consider the proposals made in the Bill are justified on principle; I think that they are fully supported by the course taken by the different Local Authorities throughout the country, and that it would be impossible, without serious results, to alter the assessments in the way suggested or to increase the amount of deduction proposed.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is now approaching an hour when I could not ask the House to go on much longer, but I would ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to consider this. I believe gentlemen who have had experience in this matter will agree with me that, however willing we might be to accept the Amendment in principle, the particular form of it is one which could not be adopted. The real controversy upon this matter must come on later, when the question of the amount of the allowance which will have to be made is discussed. It would be undesirable now to mix up the two discussions, for then we should really have the same discussion twice over. If the hon. Member would consent to withdraw his Amendment then we could more conveniently consider the two questions tomorrow.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right Gentleman has made a proposition in a very conciliatory spirit, and perhaps he will allow me to make a few remarks also in a conciliatory spirit. The point is clearly the equity of the system. Authorities not confined to that side of the House think that the simpler method suggested by the Government, the simple mechanical plan of making a fixed deduction, is a right one. That is a powerful contention, but of course the right hon. Gentleman will see that many of us naturally feel that it is rather hard that those who attempt to manage their landed property as a business should not be treated as other persons are who have a business in the country and who have large deductions. I think the Government will also feel that the particular case raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sleaford is one worthy of consideration—a case which largely answers what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. The Secretary to the Treasury has gone upon deductions made which I fancy are of old date. [Sir W. Harcourt dissented.] Well, by Assessment Committees which, at all events, in many cases preceded the great agricultural depression. Now, of course, the peculiarity of the agricultural depression, or, indeed, of any kind of depression, is that while the outgoings may be the same the returns may be diminished, and, therefore, a deduction which might be fair or even liberal under the old system of rental may not only be inadequate but grossly unjust under the new system. While the returns may be diminished by three-fourths, the outgoings may remain absolutely unchanged. I feel that the responsibility of this matter is so great—though I am far from saying that practically the departmental difficulties in the way of carrying out the Amendment may be so great that we must abandon all hope of adopting it—that it must be clear to everybody that we should not attempt to settle it at this time of night. I feel it would lead to a fuller and more amicable arrangement of the whole question if we were now to defer any further Debate upon the subject until to-morrow, as I know that there are a large number of hon. Friends of mine who desire to discuss it.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: May I add my appeal to that of my right hon. Friend. I confess my view of this particular matter is rather in favour of the Government plan than that of the Amendment, and I am very anxious to state it to the Committee.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Under these circumstances I will move, Sir, to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer,)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

SEA FISHERIES (SHELL FISH) BILL. (No. 274.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, that owing to the unanimous expression of opinion by the Sea Fisheries Committee and of Members representing certain constituencies, he, with great reluctance, withdrew his opposition to this Bill. He did so with great regret, because he believed many hon. Members were absolutely ignorant of the matter on which they were called upon by the President of the Board of Trade to legislate. If he had been fortunate enough to be able to take a Division and to induce one hon. Gentleman to tell with him or to go into the Lobby, he would have insisted on it. But it was impossible for him to take up the position of Athanasius against the world for ever, and he therefore withdrew his objection. If the President of the Board of Trade should find that the native oyster had become as extinct as the dodo, or that the price had gone up to 10s. a dozen, he would only have himself to blame.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

HERITABLE SECURITIES (SCOTLAND) (re-committed) BILL.—(No. 281.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

MR. A. CROSS (Glasgow, Cam-lachie) appealed to the hon. Member to allow the discussion to proceed, as there was a general agreement with regard to the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the hon. Member if he accepted the Amendments.

MR. A. CROSS said, he proposed to accept them all.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) objected.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.) said, he was desirous of giving every assistance to the passage of the Bill, but he found there were some Amendments put down by his hon. Friend behind him and by himself to the same effect in different words. If the matter were allowed to stand over for a day or two they would arrange the Amendments, so that there would be no duplication of them.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN objected to legislate at railway speed at this time of night, and said he must insist on his objection.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress ; to sit again upon Friday, 6th July.

IMPORTATION OF PRISON-MADE GOODS BILL.—(No. 224.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Colonel Howard Vincent.)

Mr. BYLES objected.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT appealed to the hon. Member to allow the Bill to be read a second time, as he had observed that the hon. Gentleman had stated to his constituents that prison-made goods were sold in this country at half the price of home-made goods.

Mr. BYLES said, he could not withdraw his objection. If prison-made goods were sold here for nothing it would be of great advantage to the recipients.

Second Reading deferred till Friday, 6th July.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham), in asking leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Elementary Education Acts, said : The object of this Bill, which is purely non-contentious, is in accordance with the undertaking I gave when the Local Government Act was passing through the House. It is to transfer the work of the School Attendance Committee from the Boards of Guardians to the District Councils. There are one or two small matters dealt with, including the payments for children who go to and from industrial schools.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Elementary Acts."—(Mr. Acland.)

Mr. TOMLINSON (Preston) asked how the Bill would work in the case of a county borough which was part of a present Board of Guardians district ?

Mr. ACLAND was understood to say : In a county borough where there is no School Board practically there would be no change from the present.

Where there is a School Board, of course the School Board already is the Attendance Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Acland and Mr. Shaw-Lefevre.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 302.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 1) BILL (No. 5.)

Read the third time, and passed.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 3) BILL.—(No. 244.)

Read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Eighth Report brought up, and read ; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 14) BILL.—(No. 236.)

Reported, with Amendments [Provisional Orders confirmed] ; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 18) BILL.—(No. 257.)

Reported, with Amendments [Provisional Orders confirmed] ; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Education Department, under 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870,' to enable the School Board for London to put in force the Land Clauses Acts." On Motion of Mr. Secretary Asquith, Bill to amend certain provisions of the Law with respect to Officers of the Supreme Court, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary Asquith and Sir J. T. Hibbert.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 301.]

TRUSTS ADMINISTRATION.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the liabilities to which persons are exposed under the present Law as to the administration of Trusts, and whether any further legislative provision might be made for securing adequate administration of Trusts without the necessity of subjecting private trustees and executors to the risks which they now run.—(Colonel Howard Vincent.)

FOOD PRODUCTS ADULTERATION.

Ordered, That Mr. Horace Plunkett be discharged from the Select Committee on Food Products Adulteration.

Ordered, That Mr. Dunbar Barton be added to the Committee.—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

Ordered, That Mr. Maurice Healy and Mr. Pinkerton be discharged from the Select Committee on Food Products Adulteration.

Ordered, That Mr. Kilbride and Mr. Kennedy be added to the Committee.—(Dr. Tanner.)

PETROLEUM.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the Law relating to the keeping, selling, and conveyance of Petroleum and other inflammable liquids, including the precautions to be adopted to prevent the sale of dangerous lamps for use with inflammable liquids.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of,—Sir James Carmichael, Sir Joseph Crosland, Mr. Graham, Captain Hope, Mr. Wootton Isaacson, Mr. Jacks, Mr. MacNeill, Mr. Mundella, Colonel Palmer, Mr. Paulton, and Sir Henry Roscoe.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.—(Mr. T. E. Ellis.)

EMPLOYMENT OF SOLDIERS.

The Select Committee on Employment of Soldiers was nominated of,—Mr. Austin, Mr. Benson, Commander Bethell, Mr. Birkmyre, Mr. Brookfield, General Sir George Chesney, Captain Fenwick, Captain Grice-Hutchinson, Colonel Lockwood, Mr. William M'Arthur, Colonel Murray, Mr. Wilson (Durham), and Mr. Woodall.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.—(Mr. T. E. Ellis.)

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 29th June 1894.

"COMMANDEERING" IN THE TRANS-VAAL.
QUESTIONS.

LORD KNUTSFORD : Seeing the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for the Colonies in his place, I desire to ask him whether the report in the newspapers is true that President Krüger has agreed that no more British subjects are to be "commandeered," and has consented to extend to them the same advantages as are given to the people of other countries with regard to military service?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Marquess of Ripon) : Yes. I am glad to inform my noble Friend that I have received the following telegram from Sir Henry Loch :—

"Pretoria, June 28.—Government of South African Republic agree not to 'commandeer' any more British subjects, and to enter into Convention giving most-favoured-nation clause as to military service."

THE SWAZILAND CONVENTION.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON : I have also received the following telegram :—

"Pretoria, June 28.—Government of South African Republic have agreed to extend Swaziland Convention of 1893 for six months at most, but may be terminated earlier if Swazis agree to Organic Proclamation."

LORD KNUTSFORD : Will the noble Marquess say from what time the Proclamation will extend?

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON : It is to extend from to-morrow, 30th June, to the end of the year.

EAST LONDON WATER BILL.
SOUTHWARK AND VAUXHALL WATER BILL.

WEST MIDDLESEX WATER BILL.
SECOND READING.

Read 2^a (according to Order).

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH moved—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to which these Bills shall be referred not to proceed with any clauses which will interfere with the arrangement of a comprehensive scheme for increasing the water supply of the Metropolitan district on the lines indicated in the Report of the Royal Commission presented last year."

VOL. XXVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

He said : My Lords, I am quite aware that the course which I propose to ask the House to take in regard to these Bills is not altogether a usual one, and I fully appreciate the natural and proper reluctance of this House to discuss the merits of Private Bills in the whole House. My Lords, I shall take care not to trespass upon that ground more than I can absolutely help, and I shall only occupy the attention of the House for a very few moments. But I think in this case there is a necessity for some such course being taken as that which I propose to ask the House to take, on two considerations. First, on account of the great magnitude of the interests involved ; and, secondly, because the particular aspect of the matter to which I propose to especially direct the attention of the House to-day has already been the subject of a very full and exhaustive inquiry. My Lords, I have not opposed the Second Reading of these Bills ; at any rate, to some extent and with regard to some of the purposes which they propose to effect I am in hearty sympathy, and I entirely concur with the proposal that they should go to a Committee of the House and be thoroughly inquired into in a Committee upstairs as to any matters upon which Petitions may be presented. But, my Lords, the matters involved are really rather beyond the ordinary limits of a Private Bill inquiry. Your Lordships will see what immense interests are involved when I remind you that Parliament is asked to take a new departure in regard to the water supply of more than 5,000,000 of people ; and the defects, whatever may be the advantages—I quite admit it may have many disadvantages—of our Private Bill inquiry system, it has this defect : that in dealing with a matter of such great importance the Committee upstairs only deals with those aspects of the question that are brought before them by one or other of the Petitioners who may present Petitions against the Bill. As I have indicated, there are questions of general policy going far beyond the four corners of these Bills, and these questions are involved in their passage through Parliament. I concede that in many of their purposes these Bills are on the lines of the recommendations of the Commission over which I had the honour to preside last year and the year before. But it seems to me that in considering these special Bills the Committee upstairs ought to have some general Instruction upon the lines which I indicate. The inquiry to which I have alluded embraced these two points: Is there a sufficient quantity of water in the Valleys of the Thames and the Lea to provide for the necessities of the Metropolitan District in the future, having regard to other interests; and, can that water be provided for consumption in an adequate and proper state of purity? Now, my Lords, this question has been a long time before Parliament, and it is one which ought to be settled one way or the other, and which the Government of the day believed ought to have been settled one way or the other before the still larger question of the possible purchase of the Water Companies of the Metropolis by any Public Authority was dealt with by Parliament; and it was as a preliminary step to that larger investigation that the inquiry which was entrusted to my Commission was undertaken. Well, my Lords, speaking generally, the answer to both questions as to quantity and quality of water was in the affirmative. I will only quote one passage from the Report of the Commission—it is at Paragraph 178. I may mention that I think I am entitled to say that the Report of this Commission possesses considerable authority, because those associated with me upon it were skilled in their several Departments, and we were absolutely unanimous in the opinion we came to. It is in these words—

“We are strongly of opinion that the water supplied to consumers in London is of a very high standard of excellence and purity, and such as is suitable for all household purposes.”

And we put in a proviso that there should be adequate storage provided, and that the water should be sufficiently filtered before delivery to the consumers. Your Lordships will see that the quality of the water depends largely upon the amount of storage and subsiding reservoirs which the Companies possess, and upon the efficiency of their filtrations. Some of the Companies are better provided than others in this respect, and in so far as the Bills now before the House go to provide more storage accommodation and more efficient filtration, I think they should receive the hearty approval of Parliament, always provided they have regard to the other question I have indictated—namely, that at this particular juncture nothing more should be done than is absolutely necessary, and that no question of the future should be prejudiced while the matter of the future authority for the water supply of the Metropolis is left unsettled. As to the quantity of water, the Report to which I have referred is equally emphatic; but in order that there may be sufficient water for the needs of London, it may be necessary to take water in a larger quantity than it is now taken, at some future time, from the Thames. To enable that to be done, not only without injury to the river, but with the purpose of increasing what is known technically as the minimum dry weather flow of the river, the Commission made some important recommendations, and laid down certain conditions. Among other things, they recommended that if more was to be taken from the Thames it should only be done along with the provision of ample storage reservoirs for providing what I may call the compensation water required for the river. Now, my Lords, as one of these Bills, the Bill of the Southwark and Vauxhall Company, was introduced into the other House of Parliament, it made immediate provision for taking more water from the Thames without any provision at all for storage reservoirs. That has been struck out, but the apprehension which exists in my mind is this—that if this Bill is allowed to pass in its entirety; if nothing is done to impose conditions upon this Company in Parliament, it will be putting it in an independent position. When the larger question comes to be raised afterwards, of taking water from the Thames to supply the public, this Company will be in a position of much greater independence, and will not be likely to join in the comprehensive scheme which is likely to be proposed to the other Companies. The importance of having sufficient storage reservoirs is this: First, it renders it unnecessary to take water from the Thames in times of flood when the water is less suitable than at other times; and, secondly, it enables compensation water to be given back to make up the flow of the river in dry weather. At the present time the flow is not reduced to less than 150,000,000 gallons a day passing over Teddington Lock; and if proper provisions are made, the required quantity of water may be taken from the Thames ; and the dry weather flow need never be reduced below 200,000,000 gallons a day. The necessity of having the attention of the public and of Parliament called to the matter on general grounds is this : We are told by the London County Council that they intend next year to propose a scheme to Parliament for taking over the undertakings of the Water Companies. That was publicly announced in the statement made by the Chairman of the Water Committee of the Council in his evidence before the Committee of the Houses of Parliament ; and it was also announced, on behalf of the Companies taking water from the Thames, that they are prepared to go on and propose a comprehensive scheme during next Session. So that next Session Parliament will be in a position to decide upon both the large questions which I indicated ; and my object in proposing this Instruction to the Committee now is to prevent the passage of these Water Bills through Parliament this Session prejudicing the proper consideration of the question next Session. It seems to me that two points ought to be specially kept in view by the Committee: First, that no Company taking water from the Thames at present should be put in a position which would relieve it from its share in carrying out the duty which lies upon all Companies taking water from the Thames ; that is to say, the duty of contributing to the general storage and providing compensation reservoirs ; and, secondly, I think it of paramount importance, in the interest of the London County Council and of the ratepayers of the Metropolis, that no power should be given to those Companies at present to spend more money than is absolutely necessary for carrying on their undertakings until the other question can be decided. Now, my Lords, the reason for not allowing either of these Companies—the West Middlesex, or the Southwark and Vauxhall—to escape from taking their share in a comprehensive scheme lies in this : that if one or two Companies are excluded from the larger scheme, it will follow that a much heavier and unjust burthen will fall on the other Companies. Since I put down this Motion on the Paper of your Lordships' House, communications have been made to me by the Southwark and Vauxhall Company, which lead me to hope that they recognise the reasonableness of the position I have indicated to your Lordships ; and that if some means can be found, either by the Instruction which I propose, or by the consideration of any Petition which may be presented against the Bills, a satisfactory result may be obtained. I am hopeful that the Committee upstairs will be able to get a satisfactory promise or guarantee from the Water Company. Now, my Lords, I have but very few more words to say, but I do press the second point upon the attention of the House, that it would be very unwise of Parliament at this juncture to give larger powers of expenditure to any of these Water Companies than is necessary for their immediate needs ; because it seems to me that when there are schemes in the air for taking over the Water Companies, when the London County Council had announced their intention of doing what I have indicated, I think their task ought not to be made unduly difficult, and that Parliament ought to see that nothing is done in that direction. My Lords, I do not suppose it lies with Parliament to protect the shareholders of the Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company ; but if I understand rightly the figures which were given in evidence before the Commission, it seems to me that even in their interest the comprehensive scheme shadowed forth to my Commission would be more advantageous than that proposed to Parliament if carried through in its entirety, because one Company would thereby be doing by itself and for itself what they propose, instead of giving them, as far as I can understand the figures, a much larger rateable proportion of the expense to bear. I do not like exactly to go into the figures, as I have said, on this occasion—I would prefer to leave that to the Committee upstairs—but I do hope the House will see the necessity of taking what I quite admit is the unusual step of stating its views on this larger question to the Committee to which these Bills will be sent upstairs. I beg to move the Resolution which stands in my name.

Moved—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee to which these Bills shall be referred not to proceed with any clauses which will interfere with the arrangement of a comprehensive scheme for increasing the water supply of the Metropolitan district on the lines indicated in the Report of the Royal Commission presented last year."—(The Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

*THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): My Lords, there can be no doubt that any question relating to the water supply of the Metropolis is of great importance, and that no one can be more entitled to express an opinion upon such questions than my noble Friend who has just sat down, he having acted as Chairman of the Commission (over which he presided with great ability) to inquire into the water supply of the Metropolis during the last two years. The Report of that Commission is a most exhaustive and valuable document, and the share which the noble Lord took in drawing up that Report clearly entitles him to express an opinion upon the question before the House. Now, with regard to this Motion for an Instruction to the Committee, I quite sympathise with my noble Friend's object in moving it; but I would venture, in the first place, to ask my noble Friend whether he does not think his object will be sufficiently attained by having drawn attention, as he has done in the course of his speech, to the points to which he wishes the Committee's attention to be specially drawn without moving for the Instruction of which he has given notice? It has not been the practice of your Lordships' House to give Instructions to Committees on Private Bills. I do not intend to imply by that that the noble Lord is not perfectly within his right in moving for an Instruction; and I do not say that there may not be occasions of great public importance on which such Instructions may not be justified; but I think the precedent may be inconvenient, and that it is not desirable, unless for strong reasons, to fetter the discretion of Committees upstairs. I think the speech of the noble Lord will certainly be taken into consideration by any Committee to which these Bills are referred, and the important points to which he has drawn attention will obviously receive their most careful consideration without the necessity for such an Instruction as he proposes to move for. Moreover, I would point out to the House that the proposed Instruction is in itself in such general terms that your Lordships will, I think, agree with me in thinking that a Committee would have considerable difficulty in knowing how to deal with it.

There is no definite scheme now before the House, and I think it would be very difficult to say which of the clauses might interfere with a scheme which might in future be adopted. Without going into the important points to which my noble Friend has called attention, I should wish to point out that these three Bills do not involve the construction of very large works. I think the West Middlesex Company's Bill is entirely a Money Bill. The East London Bill does, no doubt, give authority for the construction of certain storage reservoirs and for the raising of money for that purpose. The Southwark and Vauxhall Water Bill is on a somewhat larger scale, and does authorise the raising of a sum of money and the construction of storage reservoirs. But, as my noble Friend has pointed out, one important clause of that Bill, as introduced in another place, authorising that Company to draw a larger amount of water than they draw at present from the Thames, has been struck out; and I would also point out that the purposes for which the money is to be expended are much more closely defined by the Committee to which the matter was referred in another place. That may meet some of the objections which my noble Friend has to certain portions of these Bills. But I am far from saying the Bills will not require the greatest care and attention, and I am quite sure the Committee will give the greatest attention to the valuable remarks which have been made this evening by the noble Lord in the course of his speech.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I would only venture to say upon this matter that, while entirely recognising the value of the Report of my noble Friend's Commission, and while I quite agree that the Committee should not hastily pledge themselves to anything that would prevent or interfere with the action of Parliament in future, I think perhaps this would be going a little too far in pledging us to the Report of the Commission; and I think, therefore, my noble Friend would do well to consider that his object will probably be attained by the effect his speech will have upon the Committee upstairs; and I would venture, in the circumstances, to suggest to him that he should not press this Resolution now.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH : My Lords, after the expression of opinion which we have heard from the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees and from the noble Marquess, I will ask the leave of the House to withdraw the proposal of which I have given notice.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

CLOSING OF THE INDIAN MINTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF LEVEN AND MELVILLE called attention to the effect of the closing of the Indian Mints upon the export trade of India. Having invoked the indulgence usually extended by their Lordships to a maiden speech, and more particularly on account of the uninviting aspect of his theme, he said the affairs of India, so distant as is that country from us, were generally regarded as but little concerning ourselves at home. He proposed to call attention to the subject of currency—the least interesting, perhaps, of all Indian topics. Before dealing with the effect of the closing of the Mints upon the trade of India, he would briefly touch upon the condition of Indian affairs previously. India had a silver currency calculated upon a silver standard, while this country's currency was based on sterling. During the last 20 or 25 years the greater proportion of silver over gold in the world had reduced the gold price of silver to an enormous extent, and the result had been that the annual payments of India to England had very largely increased, to such an extent, indeed, that to-day they had become nearly doubled. The payments which India had to make to England had amounted in late years to about £18,000,000 sterling. Last year the Estimate was for £19,370,000, and that amount, at the present rate of exchange of about 13½, required that India should send to England no less than 367,000,000 rupees. Twenty years ago, when bar silver was at its normal value, 190,000,000 rupees would have made the same payment, so that there was a distinct loss to India on that one payment of 160,000,000 rupees. [To illustrate how this occurred, the noble Lord held in his hand two coins of equal size, containing very nearly the same amount of silver, the rupee having about 5½ grains more than the florin.] The condition of exchange was such that, while a sovereign could be bought with 10 coins of one sort (the florin) 19 of the other (the rupee) were required to make the same purchase, although both were originally intended to represent 2s. The difference in purchasing power arose from the fact that one represented the tenth part of £1 sterling in gold, while the other was calculated upon a silver standard. That illustration would show at once how it came about that double the amount had now to be paid in rupees to what used to be the case. When a country's indebtedness was increased to that extent it became very important to see what were the resources to meet it. A great increase of debt was usually caused by loans, or by some means from which the country derived a benefit; but India derived no benefit in this case, she having to pay in gold instead of currency. India's resources for paying her debts lay, as in the case of every other country, in her surplus exports—in commercial phrase "the favourable balance of trade." In illustration, if a farmer expended upon his manure, seeds, and the working of his farm more than he received for the produce he sold, he would obviously be unable to pay his rent. India was in much the same position: Unless she exported more goods than were imported for her own consumption, she could never pay her debts. He urged as an axiom, therefore, that the debts of a country could only be paid by its surplus exports. Now, what was that surplus, and which portion of her trade was most profitable? The trade of India was divided into two great and distinct sections, one being with countries in which a gold standard prevailed and the other with silver standard countries—those using a silver currency, as did India, down to the closing of the Mints. The countries with which India traded in silver currency were China, Japan, the Straits Settlements, and some others, which might be shortly described as "the silver-using East." The Blue Book showed that in the two years 1890-91 and 1891-92 the total exports from India to gold-using countries were valued at Rs.702,000,000, while in the same period the total imports were Rs.568,000,000, showing a surplus of exports of Rs.134,000,000 in regard to the gold-using countries. With the silver-using countries the exports were Rs.338,000,000 and the imports

Rs.110,000,000, showing a surplus there of Rs.228,000,000. The surplus from silver countries over gold countries was, therefore, 63 per cent. In other words, three-fifths of the surplus merchandise exports in those two years were from silver currency countries. The next inquiry was, which portions of the trade gave those surplus exports? The average exports of opium for the five years 1870-71, 1875-76, 1880-81, 1885-86, and 1891-92 were Rs.107,600,000 in value, while the average exports of cotton during the same years were Rs.148,000,000. In short, the exports of opium and cotton during that period from India comprised about 82 per cent. of the total exports to the Far East. It was clear, therefore, that those two trades were of very vital importance, India's trade with the East providing the greatest part of the surplus, and opium and cotton giving 82 per cent. of that amount. Having established that the power of India to pay her debts depended, therefore, on the surplus exports, and mainly upon the exports of opium and cotton, the noble Earl proceeded to review the financial position of India. It was in a most critical position last year. The payments which had then to be made to England had, owing to the fall in exchange, enormously increased; they had, in fact, arrived at a point never touched before. There was, moreover, the possible repeal of the Sherman Act in the United States, which, with the consequent cessation of purchases of silver in America, threatened to place more silver on the market, and still further to reduce its price. The Indian Government were in a most difficult position, and it was very hard to see what else the Government could have done. Their idea was, no doubt, bi-metallism. He would not inflict on their Lordships a dissertation on that great subject, for the discussion might last a week. He only alluded to it in reference to Sir David Barbour's Report containing the suggestion that some international agreement should be come to for fixing the ratio between gold and silver, because he gathered from the Report of the Committee on Indian Currency that Sir David Barbour would have liked an international agreement fixing a ratio between gold and silver values; failing that, he would have liked an agreement with the United States Government to fix some limit. Neither of these were "within the range of practical politics," and so the Indian Government recommended that the Mints should be closed. There seemed nothing else to be done. A Committee, presided over by the Lord Chancellor, was appointed to inquire into the question, and a great many witnesses were examined. Those witnesses gave very diverse evidence. Mr. Forbes Adams, who had been President of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, and was a Member of Council, said, the effect of closing the Mints would be to reduce the Indian export trade. Mr. Campbell, of the National Mint of India, said, that to fix an artificial value for the rupee, which was, of course, the object of closing the Mints, would injure the competition with silver standard countries. Mr. Gardiner, the manager of the Union Bank of Scotland, said, the difficulties would be intensified by the proposed remedy, and that trade would be harassed by the instability of the standard. He would not go further into the evidence. The upshot of the whole thing was, as their Lordships were aware, that the Indian Mints were closed last year. To-day the rupee did not stand, in relation to the silver coinage in the Far East, as it formerly did. The rupee depended for its value upon the market value of silver. Owing to the closing of the Mints, the value of the rupee was artificially raised, and stood to-day at 13d., while the actual value of that coin in the silver-using countries was only about 10½d. or 11d., a difference of about 2d., or in round numbers 20 per cent. The result of this was to place traders, producers, and manufacturers in India, as contrasted with those in silver-using countries, at that disadvantage. The Indian traders had to pay wages at the rate of 13d., while those in China and Japan paid wages at the rate of 10d. The two great trades on which India depended were opium and cotton. China produced opium, and Japan manufactured cotton. The result was, that the exports of opium from India to China and of raw and manufactured cotton to Japan were falling off owing to the closing of the Mints and the consequent artificial arising of the value of the rupee in India. The country had had 12 months' experience of the effects thereby produced. The value had never been so low as the point now reached, which was hardly a satisfactory result. Sir David Barbour stated in a letter that the immediate cause of the financial difficulties was the fall in the gold value of silver which had added to the Indian expenditure in two years more than four crores of rupees; and that if the rate of exchange with England could be fixed permanently, even at its present low figure, the difficulty of the deficit would be comparatively light. The letter further stated that the financial position of India was of course at the mercy of exchange, and that on a debit of 559,000,000 rupees, if the exchange rose 1d., there would be a surplus, while a deficit would be the result of a fall to an equal amount. And the letter concluded by saying what they had to consider in making their arrangements for next year was not so much increasing the public Revenue or decreasing the expenditure under their control, but the chances of a settlement of the currency question. So far from the rupee being kept in its position it had still fallen in value. The exchange, which was at one time 15d., was now only about 13d. In the direction of exchange, therefore, the closing of the Mints could not be looked upon as a very satisfactory transaction. With regard to the falling off that had taken place in exports from India, the figures for 1891-92 showed the trade in manufactured cotton to have been Rs.5,16,00,000; in 1892-93, Rs.6,20,00,000; and, in 1893-94, when the Mints were closed, they fell to Rs.4,40,00,000 only. That was for the manufactured cotton sent to China; and there was also a great fall in that sent to Japan. Raw cotton to China fell from Rs.12,00,00,000 in 1892 to Rs.11,00,00,000 in 1893; and raw cotton from Japan had also fallen from Rs.1,20,00,000 to Rs.1,00,00,000. The opium trade fell from Rs.9,20,00,000 in 1891-92 to Rs.8,00,00,000 in 1893-4. The exportation of Bombay yarns was also a matter of very great importance. To show the importance of this branch of Indian trade he pointed out that the exportation had increased from 28,000 bales in 1877 to 470,000 bales in 1892. In consequence, however, of the closing of the Indian Mints the exportation fell in 1893 to 311,000 bales, a decrease of 25 per cent. in those goods alone. While the exportation of Bombay yarns from India to China had fallen off since the closing of the Indian Mints the exportation from Japan to China had correspondingly increased during the same period. In the Report of Mr. Kopsch, the Statistical Secretary of the Customs Department at Shanghai, it was stated that—

“The dislocation in exchange brought about by according a fictitious value to the rupee and closing the Indian Mints to the coinage of silver has resulted as predicted in a very serious falling off in the entire trade from India to China. The net importation of opium for the year has declined to the extent of 2,674 piculs, or from 70,782 piculs in 1892 to 68,108 piculs in 1893. The protection of the rupee enhanced the price of opium so greatly that it placed the Indian drug beyond the means of a vast number of consumers, and this rise taking place concurrently with adequate supplies of native opium—which has so improved in quality that smokers prefer it to Malwa—renders it almost hopeless for the imported drug to continue to compete successfully with the excellent and ever-improving home-grown product. The trade in Indian yarn has likewise undergone a sudden and severe check, the quantity having receded from 1,234,400 piculs in 1892 to 937,800 piculs, or a decrease of 316,600 piculs.”

That meant a difference of 15,000 tons. Raw cotton from India had been similarly affected, only half the quantity being imported—

“The deficiency in these two Indian staples alone represents a decrease in the value of the Indo-China import trade of over 4,745,000 Haikwan taels.”

(worth 3s. 11½d). That was a considerable item. The Report continued—

“It is satisfactory to note that unclassified cotton goods, which include the tastefully designed fabrics of Japanese looms, continue to advance by immense strides, the importation of 1893 showing a rise in value of Haikwan taels 660,400, or more than double the figures of the previous year. The quantity of Japanese cotton goods landed at Shanghai during the year was 142,500 pieces, or 40,000 pieces over the importation of 1892; in 1890 only 8,200 pieces appear in the returns of that port.”

That shows that the Japanese were increasing their trade at the cost of the Indian producers. While this falling off was occurring in our Indian trade the number of Japanese spindles at work had risen from 139,000 in 1889 to 420,000, and more were going out. A large mill had been set up at Hankow and was working night and day, and there were others at Shanghai and elsewhere. The Governor of Hong Kong, Sir W. Robinson, in a speech delivered on 4th December last, said—

“There is one point to which I call particular attention. That is, that the fall in silver and the action of the Indian Government in regard to it, besides having improved the position of the tea-growers and exporters, has put new ventures, and profitable ones, within the reach of capitalists in China and Japan as well as in this colony. The Chinese are slow to begin anything new, but if the present state of affairs continues they will be compelled to produce and export many articles which they have hitherto imported from the European and other countries. The Japanese are quite alive to the situation so far as it concerns them, and are not only erecting new cotton mills, to the number of 20 it is said, but are about to take the Import Duty off raw cotton. It is possible, therefore, that we may soon see Japan, for a time, supplying China with goods which she formerly obtained from Europe or India. It seems anomalous that whilst England should be striving to extend her commerce and commercial relations in China on the one hand, she should on the other be countenancing measures which apparently have the effect of creating competition against herself and her own productions in the East. Under these circumstances, the attention of the community should be directed to the desirability of establishing cotton mills in Hong Kong."

That was very strong evidence indeed from the Governor of that Settlement. Again, the Chairman of the Hong Kong Chamber of Commerce, in giving a review of the work of the year, said—

"The most important feature of the year was the monetary revolution, caused by the closing of the Indian Mints, to the free coinage of silver, the disastrous results of which are still witnessed on all sides, and must continue to be felt for many a day to come. Although the Indian finances were in a position of great embarrassment and vigorous measures had to be taken, I think the general consensus of opinion will be that the measure of closing the Mints was one hastily adopted, the far-reaching consequences of which were improperly understood and inadequately provided against. . . . India, while closing her Mints, still allowed silver to be admitted free, until, again vacillating, she imposed a 5 per cent. duty upon it."

That amount of duty was put on the import of silver to India

"because she found that her policy was offering a premium to the Native States to become coiners of rupees, and to supply the people with a token, inadequate it is true, to meet Imperial taxation, but sufficient to move much of the internal trade of the country."

The Foreign Office official Report, Diplomatic and Consular, on Trade and Finance from Amoy stated—

"The decrease in the import of cotton piece-goods of all kinds was so great that it may well be characterised as alarming, while the trade in cotton yarn from India, which of late years has been so flourishing, has received a blow from which it will take it a long time to recover. The net import of grey shirtings fell off by 13,176 pieces, that of white shirtings by 12,130 pieces, and T-cloths by 17,324 pieces, while that of Indian yarn was 6,088,813 lbs., against 8,446,020 in 1892, a fall of close on 28 per cent.

The Earl of Leven and Melville

This shrinkage was directly due in a very great measure to the heavy fall in exchange, that resulted from the closing of the Indian Mints to silver, as this at once sent up the price of every description of piece-goods, and took away from Bombay yarn the great advantage it once enjoyed in its cheapness."

It was clear from the figures and the Reports he had read that the principal trade of India, cotton and opium, was being adversely affected by the closing of the Mints. On the other hand, having talked to many people who were interested in this matter, he was bound to say that men of the highest intelligence and skill took a totally different view, as was often the case, and thought that while some dislocation of trade was inevitable from the adoption of so great a measure, before long it would adjust itself to the present state of things. But he really could not understand on what possible ground that hopeful assumption was based. The trade was simply leaving the country for Japan and China, and if mills were once started in those countries he could not believe that any re-adjustment of trade would bring it back again to India. It would be too late to re-adjust that trade if in the meantime it had been lost. With regard to the opium trade, it was said to be falling off so rapidly that it was scarcely worth taking measures about it. That was not a very strong argument; a doctor would hardly say that a weakly child not likely to live had better be knocked on the head at once. It is said that the superiority of Indian opium was such that rich people would always insist upon having it, just as in England preference was given to Havannah cigars by those who could afford to pay for them; but he understood that Persian and Chinese opium had greatly improved, and that this preference might not last. Again, it was said that the opium trade was doomed already: that if the opium trade were falling off, it was the more necessary that we should do all in our power to preserve the Indian cotton trade. India could not afford to lose any of her export trade, and those arguments had no real strength. If the fall in exports continued at the same rate as hitherto the question would arise how India was to pay her debts. It was said that India might economise very much, but that was no reason why she should lose her trade. She could economise and take care of her trade too. This was a very difficult question, and he had tried to narrow it as much as possible, but he must refer briefly to the loss of the stable parity of exchange. India knew nothing of the troubles of exchange until the Mints were stopped; but now that stable parity of exchange, which was of the utmost importance to the prosperity of her trade with Eastern countries, had been destroyed by the artificial value given to the Indian rupee. So far he had dealt with the effect on trade, but another important point was the effect of this step upon the natives of India. From time immemorial, instead of having bankers, they had converted their earnings into silver bullion or ornaments worn by their wives. It was a very good way of keeping money, for, though they got no interest upon it, they could always, when in want of money, take their silver to the Mints and get it coined into rupees at a small charge of 2 per cent. Bangles were always worth their equivalent weight in rupees. People went to the bazaar; the bangles were put into one scale and rupees in the other, one or two over being given for the manufacture. That had always been the custom in India and was the point chiefly looked at by the people. Raising the rupee to 13d. artificially made a difference to them of 2d., or about 20 per cent. He was told by some that the natives had not found this out, and that the fears on this ground were exaggerated. We must hope that they will not find it out. If they did it must have a very bad effect upon them, as finding our capital reduced 20 per cent. would have upon ourselves. He believed they would find it out when they came to pay more silver for their taxes, calculated upon the increased value of the rupee. In conclusion, he would summarise the points thus: India's power to pay her debts depended on her surplus exports; those surplus exports depended largely on the cotton and opium trades; and, lastly, the exchange had been greatly increased by the artificial value created by the closing of the Mints. It was said that this was an experiment which there had not yet been time to test. It was, indeed, one of the largest and most important experiments ever seen in this world, for it touched the interests of 300,000,000 of an excitable race, peculiarly tenacious of their ancient customs and privileges. It harassed trades of great importance to the prosperity of India, and it destroyed the stable parity of exchange under which India had prospered in her trade with the countries of the East. Feeling the extreme importance of the subject, he had thought it well to bring it under the notice of their Lordships, whom he thanked for having listened with so much patience to a long, and he feared in some places rather involved, speech.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I am sure your Lordships will understand that I should wish to say a few words on the important subject which my noble Friend has brought before the House. It is one which has been constantly in my thoughts during the last two or three years. I shall certainly endeavour to follow my noble Friend in the moderation and temper of his observations. I feel strongly that it is a question for the consideration of which we should clear our minds altogether of prejudice; and, speaking as one who had a large share of responsibility for the legislation of last year, I can certainly say that no attachment which we may feel for our offspring will induce us to claim for it any indulgence except that which we can show it strictly deserves. My noble Friend has rested his case almost entirely upon the injury done in his opinion to the export trade of India by the closing of the Mints. He has made no Motion, but the conclusions to which his observations point is unmistakable. He has made up his mind that the currency legislation of last year has had disastrous effects upon the commerce of India, and that we have had sufficient experience of its working to justify a belief that the time has come for a reconsideration of the whole situation and for the abandonment of so dangerous an experiment. He has drawn a very alarming picture of the injury which he believes has been done to the trade of India with silver-using countries, and of the disturbance which has arisen in the balance of Indian trade, in consequence of the attempt which has been made to enhance the gold value of the rupee and to work towards the establishment of a gold standard for India. Now, as to the dislocation of the trade between India and the silver-using countries of the East, I need scarcely remind the House that the warmest supporters of the currency legislation of last year were perfectly well aware that its primary effect would probably be to bring about a disturbance of the trade of India with China and Japan. This point was one which was brought to our attention with much persistence and ability during the progress of the controversy which proceeded in India throughout 1892-3. I could quote many passages from the public speeches of members of the Government of India, showing that they were not blind to this consideration, and the argument was, as my noble Friend is aware, examined at great length and very thoroughly by the Committee presided over by the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack. Nothing could be more judicial in spirit than the manner in which the Report of the noble and learned Lord's Committee dealt with this part of the question, and they at all events were not deterred by any apprehensions of this kind from recommending that we should be allowed to stop the free coinage of silver. My Lords, the Government of India had to weigh the anticipated injury to the trade of India with silver-using countries—a trade which may be taken as equal to about one-third of the whole external trade of India—against the injuries which we had already sustained, and which we were likely to receive in the future from a rapidly depreciating currency; and the general opinion, both in official and unofficial classes, certainly was that, if we were on the one hand exposed to some risk of injury to our trade with China and Japan, we were on the other hand exposed to the risk of infinitely more serious injury to the commerce of the country as a whole, and to all classes of the community, if we took no steps to arrest the progress of the evil. I have said that the matter was one which concerned all classes of the Indian community, because it has been too often contended that our currency policy was dictated merely by a desire to mitigate the sufferings of the services, or to spare ourselves trouble arising from the confusion introduced into our accounts by continual fluctuations of the rate of exchange. That the depreciation of the rupee had involved an enormous addition to the financial burdens of the Indian Empire is a matter of notoriety. That it occasioned very cruel hardships—hardships, I must say, borne with exemplary patience and self-control—to all persons paid in rupees at rates fixed when the rate of exchange was much higher, is also well-known. That it rendered a consistent and methodical administration of the Indian finances almost impossible will also scarcely be denied. I am, however, content to rest my case, not upon any complaints which may have been made in India under any of these heads, but upon the statements which are to be found in the Report of the noble and learned Lord's Committee. That Report established beyond question that the commerce of India had in the past suffered very seriously from the violent fluctuations which had taken place in the relation between the Indian standard of value and that obtaining in those countries with which the bulk of her commerce was transacted; that the uncertainty which had existed as to the interest which would be received on British capital invested in India, and as to the diminution which the invested capital might suffer if it were desired to re-transfer it to this country, had tended to check the investment of British capital in India; and that the wage-earning classes had probably suffered by the rise in the silver prices of Indian produce—a rise which had been unaccompanied by a corresponding advance in the rate of wages. The Committee ended, in the 32nd paragraph of the Report, by expressing their belief that—

“The recent fall in silver, coupled with an open Mint, has led India to import and coin more silver than she needs, and the worst of the evil is that it is a growing one. Every unnecessary ounce of silver which has been, or is being, imported into India is a loss to India so long as silver is depreciating in gold value, for it is ex hypothesi, not needed for present use, and it can be parted with only at a sacrifice. So far as the open Mints attract unnecessary silver to India they are inflicting a loss upon the people of the country, and benefiting the silver-producing countries at the cost of India.”

That is a fair summary of the finding of the noble and learned Lord's Committee, and I prefer rather to rest myself upon it than upon any mere complaint emanating from the Government of India alone. But, my Lords, the ills which had already befallen us were as nothing compared with those which appeared to be in store for us at the time when this question forced itself upon our attention. It was perfectly well known that the Government of the United States were about to repeal the legislation under which they had for some time past been making large purchases of silver bullion; and that the stream of silver which had, since the passing of the Sherman Act, been flowing towards the United States treasury would be suddenly diverted towards the Indian Mints. My Lords, had the 54,000,000 ounces of silver which the United States Treasury had been annually purchasing been suddenly diverted to the Indian Mints we should have found ourselves face to face with a catastrophe by the side of which a temporary dislocation of the China and Japan trade pales into absolute insignificance. In two years the fall of exchange had added over four crores of rupees to our expenditure. It has been calculated that every fall of $\frac{1}{4}$ d. in the exchange value of the rupee involves an annual loss of $4\frac{1}{2}$ crores to the Government of India, and the loss becomes greater in proportion as the rate becomes lower. Your Lordships are aware of the grave embarrassment to which the Government of India is at the present moment exposed owing to the fall of the rupee to something like 1s. 1d. I ask your Lordships to consider what might have been the result had the rate of exchange suddenly fallen last year, as it might have done, to 10d. in the course of a few weeks. I do not believe that any retrenchments which we might have been able to effect, or any increase of taxes to which we might have resorted would, under such circumstances, have enabled us to meet our obligations. In the circumstances, we had to choose between bowing our heads to the blow or attempting to arrest the downward progress in the gold value of the rupee. These were the only alternatives before us. I have deliberately excluded a resort to bimetallicism as a third possibility, because it is idle to pretend that this solution was within our reach, and for all practical purposes it was unnecessary to take it into consideration. Whatever we may think of bimetallicism as a theory—and I myself regard it as theoretically unassailable—it was perfectly clear to us that, as a question of practical politics, the adoption of bimetallicism was altogether out of the question. We had to choose between stopping the free coinage of silver and sitting still. I am still of opinion that our choice was justified. The result of the action taken by the Government of India a year ago has been that we have succeeded in creating a divergence—a divergence which may become more marked in the future—between the exchange—that is, the gold value of the rupee—and the value of the silver contained in the coin. My noble Friend tells us that the result to Indian commerce has been disastrous; and I should like your Lordships to consider the extent to which the commerce of India has suffered. In the first place, it is, I think, perfectly clear that the trade of India, taken as a whole, has not suffered seriously. The exports of merchandise from India during the official year 1893-94 amounted to 102 crores against the same figures for 1892-93, and against $103\frac{1}{2}$ crores for the year 1891-92; while the imports of Indian merchandise were for 1891-92 $69\frac{1}{2}$ crores, for 1892-93 66 crores, and for 1893-94 77 crores. I shall say a word presently about the imports for 1893-94. That, at all events, does not show that the falling-off of Indian trade as a whole has been very serious or alarming. I have searched for other indications to corroborate the alarmist views of my noble Friend, but I confess I have not hitherto been successful. On the contrary, there are many indications that the trade of the Empire has not been affected. I am told, on good authority, that the rice trade between Burma and the Straits, which, of course, forms a part of our trade with silver-using countries, never was more active and flourishing than it is at the present moment. The recently-published traffic Returns of the largest of our Indian railways for the first months of the current year show a very healthy condition of things. The gross receipts of the East Indian Railway for the last half-year of 1893 were three lakhs of rupees better than the estimate, the amount received being, as was pointed out by General Strachey, the Chairman of the Company, the largest ever recorded in the second half of the year. For the half-year just ending the gross receipts show an increase of 19 lakhs, or more than 7 per cent. over those of the corresponding period of 1893, and an increase of 5 per cent. over the receipts of 1892, which were the best till now recorded. My Lords, there are no indications of a general collapse of Indian trade. But my noble Friend says that the China trade is being ruined; and he points to the fact that there was a considerable falling off last year in the exports to China. He says that upon à priori reasoning, China ought to gain and India to suffer by the change which has taken place. Now, I am well aware that it is firmly believed by many people that a depreciating currency is of advantage to the country which makes use of it. My noble Friend believes that China, at this moment, gains an advantage of about 20 per cent., as compared with that of India, owing to the depreciation of her silver currency. That a depreciating currency is an extremely advantageous thing to the country making use of that currency is, I know, a belief very prevalent in many quarters. The argument, as I understand it, is as follows. It is said that in such a case the wages of labour and prices of commodities in the silver-using country do not generally rise pari passu with the fall in the gold value of silver; and so it comes to pass that, while the merchant receives more rupees in exchange for his sovereigns or for his imports than he used, he finds that each rupee still commands the same amount of labour or the same quantity of commodities as it did before in the local markets. It is admitted that in time prices will adjust themselves, but the process is slow, and meanwhile one would expect that trade would, to a certain extent, be stimulated by the conditions which I have described. There was, I know, a very general belief that Indian trade had received a considerable stimulus of this sort, owing to the depreciation of the rupee. My Lords, this argument was fully discussed in the Report of the noble and learned Lord's Committee. Grave reasons are adduced in support of the view that the alleged advantages which I have described are very much less valuable than has been commonly supposed. The noble and learned Lord and his colleagues were, at any rate, able to point to figures showing that there was certainly reason to doubt whether the effect of a falling exchange had had any very considerable effect in increasing the export trade of

India. It has, I must say, always seemed to me that a stimulus of this kind could only be ephemeral, and that even if some temporary advantage accrued from this cause to certain members of the mercantile community, it was gained at the expense of the rest of the community, and did not afford a very satisfactory basis on which to rest the commercial prosperity of a nation. It is a little remarkable that the representatives of the China trade, who, according to this theory, ought to be the greatest gainers by a continuance of the existing state of things, are clamouring for the re-opening of the Mints—a step which would, I need not point out, have the effect of depriving them of the alleged advantage. If a depreciating currency is a benefit to the country which possesses it, it would follow that the most blessed of all countries would be one (like, let us say, the Argentine Republic) with an unconvertible paper currency, the value of which outside the country is absolutely nil, although it retains a very considerable purchasing power within the country itself. Then, my Lords, my noble Friend draws a most alarming picture of the expansion which is taking place of the commerce of China and Japan in consequence of our currency legislation. Now, I should like to remind my noble Friend, with regard to Japan, that the introduction of cotton mills into that country had taken place long before our currency legislation was dreamt of. There are at this moment, I am told, already 46 cotton mills in Japan, the outturn of which stood at 70,000 bales in 1889, and had risen to 200,000 bales in 1892. It is, therefore, quite clear that this industry would have sprung up in Japan whether we had closed the Mints or not. And it seems to me, I must say, idle to expect that in a country like Japan, with an intelligent population, quick at imitating European arts, and possessing at its doors great quantities of cheap coal, industries of this kind should not spring into existence. It is, at any rate, quite clear that this particular industry does not owe its origin or its expansion to Indian currency legislation.

THE EARL OF LEVEN AND MELVILLE: If my noble Friend will forgive me for interrupting him, I certainly did not intend to say that the growth of Japanese manufactures was entirely owing to the Indian Mints. On the contrary, I stated that the Japanese manufactures were flourishing, but I pointed out that there was a large and sudden increase last year at the time the Mints were closed, and that, taking the other figures into account, that was probably due to the closing of the Indian Mints.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE : I admitted at the outset that the closing of the Mints was not unlikely to have a disturbing effect on the trade with silver-using countries ; but my point is, that in this case the transfer of trade has been at the most accelerated thereby. I pass from Japan to China, the other country mentioned by my noble Friend. My noble Friend was not able to tell us that any mills have yet been opened in China, nor have any, I believe, as a matter of fact yet been closed in Bombay. China is a very conservative country. China has at present no railways, no telegraphs, and she has, so far as we are aware, a rooted objection to allow herself to be opened up to European enterprise. It is possible, of course, that the cotton industry may spring up in China ; but I am inclined to say that, supposing this should happen, and that China should be opened up to foreign enterprise, nothing could be more advantageous to the commerce of the British Empire as a whole. I feel convinced that if China were to become accessible to British enterprise, the Empire, and to some extent even India, would gain by the change. But are we justified in attributing the disturbance of the China trade entirely to the closing of the Mints ? I had occasion to go into this question shortly before I left India, and it was then reported to me that during the three years preceding the closing of the Mints there had been an enormous export of cotton yarns from India to China, that stocks had consequently accumulated in China, with the result that prices naturally fell very low, and that, as the manufacture became unprofitable, it was decided by the Indian millers, about the end of February last year, to work short time. This decision was not carried into effect until the 20th of April, at which time the Yarn Merchants' Association at Hong Kong telegraphed to the mill-owners of Bombay—

“ Chinese merchants meeting unanimously advocate mills working short. Excessive over-supply detrimental to general trade interests.”

It was thereupon decided to close the mills for three days per week for the next three months. Your Lordships will observe that all this happened before, and not after, the closing of the Mints, so that in this case even the post hoc ergo propter hoc argument of my noble Friend, of which he is so fond, does not apply. There seems to be no doubt whatever that the interruption of the China trade was due at least as much to over-supply and a falling demand as to the stimulus which my noble Friend believes was given to Chinese competition by the stoppage of the free coinage of silver in India. But, my Lords, as to this alleged transfer of manufactures from India to other Eastern countries, I would ask your Lordships whether it is quite clear that such a transfer necessarily means the permanent ruin of the Indian millowners ? Your Lordships should remember that many of the Indian mills were built before the divergence which took place between the value of silver and gold, and that they were constructed in order to supply the requirements, not of China and Japan, but of India itself. It is quite possible that the conditions of our Indian trade are undergoing a considerable alteration, and that they may have to adjust themselves to a new state of things ; but I, for one, shall refuse to believe that with cheap labour, 300,000,000 of customers at their doors, and a population increasing at the rate of 33,000,000 in every 10 years, the Indian manufacturers are going to be driven out of the market merely because they are threatened, as they are sure to be sooner or later, with competition in Japan or elsewhere. These transfers of industry from one part of the world to another have always occurred ; they are part of the conditions under which the commerce of the world is carried on, and India cannot expect to escape from them any more than Manchester. Then, my Lords, my noble Friend is terrified because during the few months which followed the closing of the Mints the balance of trade which had up to that time been in favour of India suddenly showed signs of turning against her, and he sees in this phenomenon a warning that she will be unable to meet her obligations, and that she is threatened with bankruptcy. Now, my Lords, it is undoubtedly a fact that during the last six months of 1893 the balance of trade was unusually adverse to India; but it is most important that your Lordships should remember that this was due, not to any large failure of exports, but to a most extraordinary expansion in the imports of those six months. If, however, your Lordships will take the trouble to examine the figures you will find that there are many reasons for which we can afford to look on this sudden spurt in the imports without over-much concern. It is, in the first place, to be remembered that in the preceding year, 1892, the imports of merchandise for the same months were abnormally low. They stood at 32 crores, as compared with 36 crores and 35 crores in 1890 and 1891. Stocks had been depleted, and it was to be expected that in 1893, under the peculiar circumstances of that year, persons desiring to remit to India should have sent out—as they actually did—very large quantities of piece-goods. But even if all these facts be taken into consideration, your Lordships will find that, although the total of the imports for the last six months of the year was certainly high, amounting, as it did, to Rx.48,250,000, it was not higher than the total of the imports for the year 1890, which reached no less than Rx.48,500,000. Whether, however, the state of things was as serious as my noble Friend supposes, it is satisfactory to know that, although the balance of trade was against India in the months immediately following the closing of the Mints, it has inclined in the opposite direction since November of last year. Your Lordships will find that in the month of July, 1893 (the Mints were closed in June), the balance of trade turned against India, the net imports of treasure and merchandise exceeding the exports by six lakhs. In August the balance against India was nearly three lakhs; in September, $1\frac{1}{2}$ lakhs; in October, $18\frac{1}{2}$ lakhs. But in November the tide turned, and we had a balance in our favour of over a lakh, which in December rose to 10 lakhs, in January to 12 lakhs, in February to 15 lakhs, and in March to 33 lakhs. I am told that both April and May have shown balances in our favour. My Lords, I would sum up what I have to say with regard to this part of the subject in the following propositions :—We all of us expected that our currency legislation would lead to some dislocation of the trade of India with silver-using countries, and that dislocation has taken place. It is less serious than my noble Friend supposes, and there is no reason for believing that trade will not in time adjust itself to the new conditions which have arisen. If India is losing trade, a part of that trade would, there is reason to suppose, have been lost to us anyhow, and it will probably be replaced by other trade after the markets have had time to adjust themselves. But the real gravamen of my noble Friend's complaint is, I think, that, while we have injured the China trade, we have failed to secure the compensations which we had expected in the shape of increased stability and a higher exchange value for the rupee. I might say in passing that my noble Friend ought to be the last person in the world to complain if the rupee has not risen to 1s. 4d., for it is perfectly clear that, if he anticipates so much trouble with the rupee at 1s. 1d., the case would be infinitely worse if it had risen at once to the higher-water mark of 1s. 4d. What I have to say with regard to this part of the case is that to the best of my belief no one of those who were responsible for the legislation of last year ever ventured to hold confidently that it would be immediately successful. In his speech on the introduction of the Bill of last year, the distinguished financier quoted by my noble Friend, Sir David Barbour, expressly said that, in his opinion, time alone could show whether the measure would produce immediate results, or whether it might not involve a long and arduous struggle and necessitate very heavy sacrifices. I do not think we need be ashamed to confess that in some respects the struggle has turned out to be even more arduous than we anticipated; but I hold strongly that nothing has occurred to show that success is unattainable. What was the essence of the policy of 1893? It was a belief in the possibility of enhancing the gold value of the coined silver of India by the contraction of the supply of such coinage. It is quite clear that this could be affected only in one of two ways—either by reducing the redundant currency of the country, or by refusing to increase the supply of that currency and allowing the demand to overtake the supply. Whether it would have been possible to accelerate the operation of the measure by reducing the currency I will not now pause to inquire; such a course would obviously have been costly, and in many respects inconvenient. For the present we are relying entirely upon the first of the two courses. It is impossible to say how long it will be before the cause produces the desired effect. I will not now venture to decide whether the attempt of the noble Earl, now Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to accelerate the operation of the currency measure by holding back his Council bills was well advised or not. It was made at the instigation of the Government of India, and it was generally believed in India that it might have been successful had the noble Earl not abandoned it when he did, as we believe, on the very eve of success. That attempt, however, formed no part of the essential policy of the Government of India; it was a mere excrescence, and its abandonment does not by any means imply the failure of the great experiment of last year. I am one of those who are still unconvinced that the experiment either has failed or is destined to failure. Then came the long struggle between the Secretary of State and the remitters to India. Nothing could have been more promising than the position on paper. The Government of India closed the Mints; the remitters could no longer send bullion to be coined; and it was hoped that they would consequently buy the Secretary of State's bills at a figure profitable to the Government of India. As I have already told your Lordships, it unfortunately happened that the stocks of piece-goods had been depleted during the year 1892, and the remitter, instead of buying bills, was able to meet his obligations by sending cotton goods to India. Then came the huge imports of silver bullion, of which no less than 7½ crores' worth found its way to India during the last six months of the year. All this while gold was appreciating, and silver depreciating, and the silver in the rupee, which we were endeavouring to bolster up, continued to fall in value. No combination of circumstances could have been more unpropitious. It was in the face of all these obstacles that the Government of India undertook the task of giving a fictitious value to what the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack properly described as a token currency of unparalleled magnitude. I cannot help thinking that it is an answer to those who tell us that the failure of the experiment has been demonstrated, to say that, in spite of all these obstacles and drawbacks, the rupee has at this moment an exchange value of more than 2d. above its intrinsic value as silver bullion. To that extent we have succeeded in carrying out the main object of the legislation of last year, which was to effect a divorce between the gold value of the rupee and its bullion value. This result has, moreover, been achieved in the face of the largest sales of Council bills which have ever taken place in the same number of months. Between April 1 and June 27 of the present year the Secretary of State has succeeded in selling 9½ crores' worth of Council bills—an amount far exceeding the average of the four preceding years. In spite of these huge sales, the exchange value of the rupee is not only not falling, but has lately shown a tendency to rise. I say, therefore, that it would be altogether unreasonable to contend that the legislation of last year has already broken down. I earnestly trust that no such view will receive the support of Her Majesty's Government. It seems to me that we, who are responsible for the financial policy of last year, have a right to ask that it should be fairly tried. That, I believe, is the desire of the mercantile community of India. It is a remarkable fact that at a recent meeting of the Calcutta Chamber of Commerce a resolution in favour of reopening the Mints to the free coinage of silver—though proposed by one of its ablest and most influential members, Mr. Robert Steele—was rejected by a very large majority—a majority, I believe, of three or four to one. No responsible authority has, so far as I am aware, recommended the re-opening of the Mints in the interests of India. The legislation of last year received the support not only of the Government of India, but of the great majority of the mercantile classes of the country. It was approved, after the amplest consideration, by Her Majesty's Government, and it received the support of the remarkable body of experts presided over by no less an authority than the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. Currency legislation, undertaken under such circumstances and with such sanctions behind it, should not be lightly abandoned, or discredited because difficulties, many of which had been foreseen, have presented themselves in its course. Some of those difficulties have, I believe, been mainly due to want of confidence on the part of the public, and to the belief that either the Government of India or Her Majesty's Government were themselves irresolute. I deprecate strongly any action which might have the effect of strengthening such an impression; and, although I am far from regretting that my noble Friend should have brought on this discussion, I earnestly trust that it will not end without an explicit statement on the part of Her Majesty's Government that they have no intention of abandoning the legislation of last year, and that it will remain in force until its failure has been demonstrated by arguments much more conclusive and cogent than those which my noble Friend has been able to lay before us this evening.

*LORD REAY: After the interesting speeches of my noble Friends I need not detain the House very long, but I should like to go a little more fully into the trade statistics. The trade of India, taken as a whole and compared with previous years, gives the following results:—The exports of merchandise (Rx.106,515,000) were less by only Rx.80,000 than in 1892-93, and higher than in any previous year except 1891-92, and in that year the exports of wheat were quite abnormal, being $7\frac{1}{2}$ millions above the average of other years. The exports of 1893-4 exceeded by nearly $3\frac{1}{2}$ millions the average of the last five years. The imports of merchandise were Rx.77,026,000, or $7\frac{3}{4}$ millions above the average of the previous five years. The increase of imports represents, of course, payments in kind for exports, and it is impossible that imports of goods can affect the trade of India, or of any country, prejudicially. The aggregate trade in 1893-94, amounting in merchandise to Rx.183,500,000, exceeds by more than 11 millions, or nearly 7 per cent., the average trade of the five years 1888-93, and by about 6 millions, or some $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the trade in 1891-92, hitherto the best year on record. The exports of Indian produce and manufactures were Rx.102,024,000. This figure has only been exceeded once—namely, in 1891-92, when it was Rx.103,551,000; but in that year the exports of wheat were, as I have already mentioned, quite abnormal. The reduction in the exports of wheat was not due to the closing of the Mints. They fell from Rx.14,380,000 in 1891-92 to Rx.7,440,000 in 1892-93, and Rx.5,193,000 in 1893-94. But during the last nine months of 1893-94 there was an improvement of Rx.493,000 as compared with the last nine months of 1892-93. This improvement occurred after the closing of the Mints. The gold price of wheat in Europe is the determining factor of the wheat trade. With regard to rice, the exports in 1891-92 were Rx.13,387,000, in 1892-93 Rx.12,409,000, in 1893-4 Rx.10,389,000. The reduction in this case was foreseen in a circular issued by Messrs. Fraser and Company in January, 1893, which stated that the prices would range lower "than any which have hitherto been recorded in the annals of the rice trade."

The fall in price in this case also accounts for the shrinkage. Opium shows a falling off. Exports in 1891-92 amounted to Rx.9,562,000, in 1892-93 to Rx.9,255,000, in 1893-94 to Rx.9,019,000. Government sold at Calcutta in 1891-92 56,250 chests, in 1892-93 48,852, in 1893-94 43,353. Here the failure is due to bad harvests, shrinkage of cultivation, and exhaustion of stocks. In cotton goods manufactured in India the exports of 1891-92 were Rx.6,905,000, in 1892-93 Rx.7,999,000, in 1893-94 Rx.6,149,000. The markets in China had been overstocked; the falling-off commenced before the Mints were closed, and the latest figures are more satisfactory. The exports of cotton twist and yarn and piece-goods to China in the second quarter of 1893-94 were Rx.815,000, in the third quarter Rx.1,065,000, in the fourth quarter Rx.1,332,000. Comparing the quarters we find that the falling-off in the total exports of cotton manufactures, which began in March, 1893, was very heavy in the second quarter, less so in the third, and in the fourth the exports are hardly inferior to the average of the preceding five years. We had, therefore, falling markets before the closure, and we have a rising market after the closure. But it may be said that the exports were beginning to increase just before the Mints were closed, and that a revulsion then occurred; and this is true to a certain, but not a very great, extent. Compared with the average of the corresponding quarters for the five previous years, the exports of merchandise increased from April to June by 12 per cent., from July to September they were 3 per cent. below the average, from October to December they were better by 2 per cent., and from January to March better by $1\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., than the average. Gold, which at present is merely a commodity, is usually imported into India in considerable quantities, and, in spite of a net export in 1891-92 of Rs.2,414,000, the net imports on the average of the last five years were Rs.2,533,000. But in the last quarters of 1893-94 the current was reversed, and gold was exported to the extent of Rs.515,000. It was supposed that, with the cessation of coinage of silver in the Indian Mints, the imports of this metal would have been checked, but that expectation has not been fulfilled. It is, however, a mistake to suppose that they have been exceptionally stimulated. From April to June, when there was a general belief that some measure might be adopted which would improve the value of coined silver in India, the net imports exceeded the previous five years' average by Rs.1,009,000; from July to September, although Rs.1,800,000 was in transit when the Mints were closed, the net imports were below the average by Rs.44,000; in the three months from October to December they were above it by Rs.462,000; and from January to March below it by Rs.139,000. So that in the nine months following the closing of the Mints the net imports of silver have exceeded the average by only Rs.279,000. Your Lordships will see that it would be premature to draw any conclusions from the statistics which I have given, even if the closure of the Mints had alone to be taken into account. But in August, 1893, the free sale of bills was checked, and was only resumed by direction of the noble Earl, the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (who regrets that his official duties do not allow him to be present) towards the end of January. The noble Marquess has complained of the fact that we resumed the sale of Council bills, but I would ask my noble Friend whether he would have contemplated with equanimity the increase of the gold debt of India, which would have been the inevitable alternative of not resuming the sale of Council bills.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: What I said was, that the Government of India would have been glad if the Secretary of State could have seen his way to hold his hand a little longer.

*LORD REAY: I understand that my noble Friend's criticism did not go beyond an expression of regret that further delay had not been deemed possible. The influence on trade of the experiment of closing the Mints cannot be traced in the statistics of 1893-94, and it will be necessary to allow further time in order to see what its effects are, when Council bills are available. I need not go into the financial aspect of the question. The answer to much of what my noble Friend who spoke first has said was given, in anticipation, in the Report of the Committee on the Indian Currency. Before sitting down, I can, however, give the noble Marquess the assurance which he asked for. I wish to state that there is no intention whatever of re-opening the Mints, and that the experiment will be given a full and fair trial.

VISCOUNT CROSS: It is not my intention to prolong the Debate to any extent nor to add one single figure to the mass of figures which have been laid before us. No one can be more painfully aware than I am of the difficulties which beset the Finance Minister of India during the past few years. The fall of the rupee was so serious, and no one knew how much lower it might go, nor what would be the result to India if it did go still lower. These considerations lead me to the belief that the Government of India and the Home Government were right in trying what means could be devised by which this terrible difficulty to the Finance Minister of India might be avoided. The difficulty of the Finance Minister of India can hardly be imagined when having to make up his Budget, for he could not tell whether he would have in hand a surplus of £1,000,000, for which he budgeted, or a deficit of £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 at the end of the year. That position was absolutely impossible, and some remedy had to be found, supposing that a remedy were indeed possible. I do not envy the position of those gentlemen who sat on the Currency Committee, presided over by the noble Lord on the Woolsack. They had a very difficult task to perform, and they did not arrive at their conclusions without very full and adequate inquiry and due consideration. Under the circumstances, I do not wonder at the Government of India accepting the Report of the Committee and acting upon it. The noble Marquess said that he was perfectly aware of the responsibility of the step which the Government of India then took. It was a grave step, carrying with it a disturbance in the trade with foreign countries, and it could not, I feel sure, have been taken by the Government without grave consideration of the serious responsibility resting upon them. That step has been taken—I am not saying whether it was right or wrong—and we have not yet had time to see what the actual result of that step will really be. As I said, I do not desire to say whether the step that has been taken by the Indian Government in closing the Mints was right or wrong, but I am not surprised that the Government has at present refused to dislocate trade again by reversing their action in the matter. I say “at present,” because the subject must be carefully reconsidered from time to time in order to see what the effect of the alteration has been. I am sure the Government themselves would say that they will watch the effect of it very anxiously, because it may turn out that some other method of meeting the financial difficulty may be better than the plan we have got; but I do not think that any step should be taken in a new direction until the present plan has had a fair and full trial.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): I do not want unnecessarily to add anything to what has fallen from my noble Friend who has spoken on behalf of the Government, but this subject is of such transcendent importance to the prosperity of India that I trust that your Lordships will permit me, as having been Chairman of the Committee which sat to consider this question, to say a few words with regard to it. I desire, in the first place, to say that there is a fallacy involved in separating—as my noble Friend who introduced the subject did—the exports to the silver-using East from the rest of the exports, when we are striking the balance of trade of imports over exports. The total imports of merchandise, and the total exports of merchandise, should, in my judgment, be taken. It is, therefore, of the highest importance to observe that in the financial year which terminated with the end of March last the total exports of merchandise from India were within a fraction the same as the total exports of merchandise of the previous year. The figures approximate extraordinarily close to each other. In 1892-93 the total exports were Rx.106,595,000, and in 1893-94 the total exports were Rx.106,515,000. There has been, it is true, a great falling off in the exports of Indian wheat, but of that I am sure your Lordships will not regret, considering the complaints that have been made of the large importations of Indian wheat into this country. But the exports of wheat last year was something like Rx.3,000,000 below the average of the past five years—it was lower, indeed, than it has been in any year during the past five years—but that, of course, had nothing to do with the closing of the Mints. Therefore, had the export of wheat last year equalled that of the average of the last five years, the total export of merchandise from India last year would have exceeded the total export of merchandise of any previous year. That is a fact of very great importance. But it is said that the balance was to some extent less than it would be because of the large imports of merchandise; and no doubt the imports last year were several millions in excess of previous years. But that is not a bad thing for India. People do not suffer because they buy more goods imported from another country. The noble Lord who brought forward this subject has said that the closing of the Mints in India have caused a great dislocation of trade with silver-using countries. But, supposing that in consequence of keeping the Mints open and in consequence of the repeal of the Sherman Act the value of the rupee had fallen from 1s 3d. to 10d., what effect would that have had in dislocating and even paralysing the export trade with gold-using countries, which is twice as great as the trade with silver-using countries? I may go further, and ask what would have been the effect of that fall in value of the rupee upon the cotton trade of Lancashire? In my opinion, such a fall in the value of the rupee would have had a far more disastrous effect upon that branch of trade than the effect which my noble Friend who introduced the subject said the closing of the Mints has had on the trade between India and China. No doubt we have heard very loud complaints with regard to the falling off of the trade between India and China, but we must receive those complaints with some caution, because they chiefly emanate from those who are interested in keeping up the price of silver, which the closing of the Mints has tended to lower. These people are likely to suffer from any fall in the value of silver, and they, therefore, are not inclined to make the best of the effects of closing the Mint. No doubt the closing of the Mints has had some effect on the trade between China and Japan, but the effect of that operation has undoubtedly been far less upon the trade between India and China than might have been supposed. Indeed, those of us who have studied the question, so far from being surprised that there was such a dislocation of trade as has been proved to be the case, are surprised that there was so little dislocation. My noble Friend has quoted statistics, principally comparing 1893 with 1892. But the noble Marquess has already called attention to the fact that in 1893 there was such a glut of these goods in the China market, that even before the Mints were closed the merchants saw that it was absolutely essential to work short time in order to diminish the exports. Let me compare this year with 1892. In January, February and March of 1892, the exports of cotton goods to China were Rx.1,207,000 in value, and in January, February and March of 1893, the exports to China were Rx.1,077,000 in value. But in the first three months of the present year the exports to China were Rx.1,332,000, as against Rx.1,207,000 in the first three months of the year before last. Therefore, taking the first three months of 1894 and the first three months of 1891, there was an actual increase in the trade between the two countries in the former, as compared with the latter period.

I therefore think that it is clear that there has not been that mighty revolution in trade between the two countries which it has been assumed that the closing of the Indian Mints has brought about. With regard to the course which was taken of closing the Mints, my noble Friend who brought forward this subject has admitted that the position of the Government at the time when they arrived at this decision was one of enormous difficulty, and that their determination was not come to with a light heart. The various matters to which my noble Friend alluded were most anxiously considered, and it was only after looking at the subject all round that the Government came to the conclusion that the course which they subsequently adopted was the one that would give rise to the least danger. We had then to look forward. We have now had the experience of a year. Since the policy of the Government has been carried into effect I have watched the result of its operation very closely from day to day, as I have been in business myself. I have made myself acquainted with the rates of exchange every day, and I have read everything that has been written by those in authority in relation to the effect that the closing of the Mints has had upon the trade of India, and the result of my examination has been to lead me to the conclusion that if I were again consulted upon the subject I should give precisely the same advice that I did before. The noble Marquess has shown that it would be difficult indeed to say that the step taken has been a failure. The circumstance that had to be faced was the imminent repeal of the Sherman Act. What was the effect of that Act? It was to set free, as it were, in the market silver amounting to many millions in value. Supposing that step had been suddenly taken with the Mints open, can it for a moment be doubted that there must have been an enormous fall in the price of silver? Some say that if the Indian Mints had been kept open the price of silver would have been kept up. I am utterly unable to follow the reasoning which leads to that conclusion. I could understand it if it could be shown that India had taken, say, £11,000,000 less of silver during the past year, which might have been to some extent filled up by the supply so set free. But during last year the Indian demand has been as great as ever it was. The closing of the Mints in India has not made India at all a worse customer for silver. Then, how was this £11,000,000 to be disposed of? Was it to go into India in addition to the normal demand? and is it conceivable that there should not have been in such circumstances an enormous fall in the price of silver? If you have your previous customer—who may be even as ready to buy as before—can you get rid of your customer for one-third of the total production of the world without a tremendous fall in the price of the article? because, however matters might in time adapt themselves and new purchasers be found, it is obvious that the fall must have been great. I have already touched upon what would have been the consequences of so great a fall upon the trade of India generally, and what would have been the consequences as regards the Government of India. When it is said that the experiment has failed, I would like to call your Lordships' attention to one single fact. During the last three months, that is, the first three months of this financial year, the Government of India disposed of Council bills which have fetched a trifle over £5,000,000 sterling. If they had been sold at the intrinsic value of the rupee, according to the price of silver in the silver market, the Indian Government would have got more than £750,000 less for those bills than they have got. Surely it is very difficult in the face of such a fact as that to say that the experiment has failed. No doubt it has not succeeded as some expected and hoped that it would; but enough has been said to show that it is much too early to even entertain the idea of going back from this experiment and reverting to the old condition of things—namely, open Mints, although, of course, the Government would do wisely in India and in this country in keeping their ears open to the suggestion of any new course which would commend itself to people generally as being a better or more satisfactory one than the present. There is just one point I should like to say a word upon, otherwise misapprehension may be caused. My noble Friend spoke of the effect upon India of the fall of the rupee as being this—that she has to pay twice as much as before in paying her debts because she has to pay double the number of rupees. That statement involves a fallacy to which it is most desirable to call attention, because it would be very desirable that the people of India should be led to think that their burden had been increased in a way and manner in which it had not been increased. It depends on the purchasing power of the rupee. India pays her debt nominally in rupees, but really in produce. She may pay many more rupees than she did before; but if the gold price of her produce remains the same, she gets for it a great many more rupees than she did before. If you have the gold price remaining the same your rupee may depreciate as much as you please, you will get so many more rupees for the produce, and inasmuch as ultimately the balance is really settled by the transfer of produce from India to this country for the purpose of making payments, it does not follow because she is paying in appearance so many more rupees that she is being subject, except in the slightest degree, to a greater burden than before. Of course, to the extent to which the gold price falls, to the extent to which she does not get the increased number of rupees for the gold price of her produce corresponding to the depreciation, no doubt the burden is increased, but to nothing like the amount which you would suppose if you were to regard the whole of this increased number of rupees as an increase of burdens. No doubt, in one respect India has suffered in the payment of her debt, but it is in a respect in which all nations that have to pay debts have suffered. In so far as produce has been lower in price before; if, for example, the same quantity of wheat fetches only half the price, it will only go half as far towards paying heavy debt, and in that respect India has suffered in the way in which other nations have suffered. I should like to disabuse your Lordships of the impression that because an increased number of rupees have to be paid in order to discharge the gold debt to this country it necessarily represents an increase of burdens. There are just two other matters to which I should like to allude. My noble Friend spoke of the silver which is held by the people of India as not now being, as it was before, equivalent to its weight in rupees. The noble Lord speaks as though the people of India who had got the silver were getting less for it than they would if the Mints had been open. No doubt, if the Mints were open and the rupee had fallen in value to the same extent as silver as before, you would have to weigh your silver as against rupees. But if by closing the Mints the rupee has a higher value than the silver, and will produce more than the same amount of silver, then, although the man who sells silver gets fewer rupees than is equivalent to the weight of silver, he may get precisely the same purchasing power as he did before, because the rupees will purchase more; therefore, the real truth is it is a fallacy to suppose that those who have in India any silver had suffered in that way by the closing of the Mints. The final point with which I will trouble your Lordships is this: I do not altogether agree with the view suggested by my noble Friend that the ability of India to pay her debt depends upon this balance of exchange. India would have to pay her debt if there were no balance of exchange. It would have to be done in this way: Suppose you had no balance of exports over imports the Government of India would, of course, have in her coffers the rupees collected in taxes. She would have to pay her debt in England. She might do it in a variety of ways. One way would be to go into the market and buy produce and send it to England for sale, and the sale of produce purchased for rupees in India from the Government Treasury and sold here for gold would, of course, pay the debt. It is quite true you might, under those circumstances, have to go into the market and enter upon theoretical transactions not on the most favourable terms for the Government of India, but you would, pro tanto, artificially increase the exports of India for the purpose of paying your debt. So long as you have a debt to pay, and pay it, the surplus of exports over imports must be sufficient, because they will have to be made sufficient to pay your debt. Of course, I do not for a moment dispute that under these circumstances your transaction may not be as favourable a one for the Government as it is if you have a natural surplus of exports over imports, but all I would point out to my noble Friend is this: I think it is a mistake to suppose that it is the surplus of exports over imports which enables India to pay its debts. It affords a more convenient and more advantageous method. The rupees which the Government of India has to convert into gold may go further, but it is not upon that that the payment of debt depends. I will not trouble your Lordships further. It is only the great importance of the subject which has induced me to trouble you so far.

[The subject then dropped.]

THE INDIAN TARIFF BILL.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for—(1) A copy of the Report of discussions in the Legislative Council of the Governor General of India, concerning the Indian Tariff Bill of 1894; (2) A copy of the dissents recorded by Members of the Council of India relating to the same subject; and (3) Copy of the East India Financial Statement for 1894-95, and of the proceedings thereon in the Legislative Council of India.”

He said, he had been informed by his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for India that the Correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Government of India was not at present completed, and therefore the Secretary of State for India did not consider it desirable that it should be laid before Parliament in its present condition. He would only say he felt certain when it was complete it would be absolutely necessary that that Correspondence should be laid before Parliament, because the responsibility in this matter evidently rested entirely with the Secretary of State for India.

*LORD REAY: There is no objection to this Return.

Address agreed to.

OUTDOOR RELIEF (FRIENDLY SOCIETIES) BILL.—(No. 88.)

House in Committee (according to Order.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: There are some Amendments which ought to be made to this Bill, but I think they will be made more satisfactory in the Standing Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I quite agree they will be better made in the Standing Committee.

Bill reported, without Amendment ; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

MERCHANDISE MARKS (PROSECUTIONS) BILL.—(No. 133.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD RIBBLESDALE moved the Second Reading of this Bill, which, he explained, contained only one clause. It was the outcome of the Report of the Committee presided over by Lord Onslow, and was an earnest of the assurance given by Lord Playfair some time ago in that House, that the same powers should be given to the Board of Agriculture as were at present exercised by the Board of Trade in cases of misrepresentation under the Merchandise Marks Act, Section 2. He begged to move the Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a." —(The Lord Ribblesdale.)

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 1) BILL.

Brought from the Commons ; Read 1^a ; to be printed ; and referred to the Examiners. (No. 138.)

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 3) BILL.

Brought from the Commons ; Read 1^a ; to be printed ; and referred to the Examiners. (No. 139.)

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 12) BILL.
(No. 117.)

House in Committee (according to Order) : Bill reported without Amendment : Standing Committee negatived ; and Bill to be read 3^a on Monday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 11) BILL.
(No. 113.)

Read 3^a (according to Order), and passed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 5) BILL.—(No. 110.)

Read 3^a (according to Order), and passed.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 76.)

Read 3^a, with the Amendments : A further Amendment made ; Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

BISHOPRIC OF BRISTOL ACT (1884) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 131.)

House in Committee (according to Order) : Bill reported without amendment ; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 29th June 1894.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

THAMES CONSERVANCY BILL
(by Order.)

On the Order for the Adjourned Debate on the consideration of this Bill as amended, the 10th of July was mentioned on the part of the promoters for resuming the Debate on the Amendment proposed.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, that while he should offer no opposition to the date fixed by the promoters of the Bill, he should have preferred an earlier date. He and his friends would have been perfectly prepared to take the Debate on Monday next.

Adjourned Debate further adjourned till Tuesday, 10th July.

BARRY RAILWAY BILL.

*MR. A. WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.), who had a Notice on the Paper to re-commit this Bill to Committee, and also a Notice moving an Instruction to the Committee, on behalf of the Glamorgan County Council, that a clause should be inserted in the Bill providing that the proposed line should be opened for passenger traffic within a reasonable period, said, he was glad to say it would not be necessary for him to move this Resolution. The House would remember that according to the opinion of Lord Balfour of Burleigh, before whom a similar Bill came, the Local Government Act of 1888 had imposed on County Councils the duty of looking after the interests of the public in railway matters, and especially when any new line was proposed to Parliament. In the case of this line, which was a public railway but was only used for mineral traffic, it was of great importance to the people of the district through which it would pass that it should be opened to passenger traffic as soon as possible.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what is the Question before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Gentleman appealed to me, and I was obliged to tell him that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, he could not move the Instruction, and the hon. Member is now, I understand, prefacing with some remarks the withdrawal of the Notice. The hon. Member is not in Order to propose to make it a condition precedent to the sanction by the House of a particular line that on all the lines of the system of the Company accommodation should be provided for passenger traffic. It would be contrary to the practice of the House to impose such a condition on a Company before a particular line—a mineral line, on which no question of passenger traffic arises—is sanctioned. If thought desirable, general legislation should be invoked.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS: Then the hon. Member is not in a position to make the Motion?

MR. SPEAKER: No; the hon. Member is addressing the House by way of explanation and on the understanding I have mentioned.

MR. A. WILLIAMS, continuing, said, the Bill which was now reported to the House was a Bill for a small extension of the main line of the Barry Railway Company. This Company obtained an Act in 1884 in order to obtain communication from the dock to the coal district, about 12 miles away. From that year onwards there had been carried a large quantity of coal and large dividends had been earned, and there was now an application for extension of the main line powers being taken to carry passengers as well as minerals. Neither the Glamorgan County Council nor the public had any desire whatever to oppose the line. Indeed, they were anxious the line should be made. The only object in view in the action he was taking was that, in the interest of the Company and the public alike, the Company should be called upon to give some undertaking that within a reasonable time they would provide for passenger traffic on the new line. The accommodation was greatly needed, and he would appeal to the Board of Trade to bring their influence to bear in the matter.

MR. SPEAKER: I have to point out that there is no Question before the House, as the hon. Member does not move the Motion standing on the Paper in his name. But the hon. Member has, perhaps, said enough as to the facts of the case and the policy involved. I do not think the discussion can be continued.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): Would it be out of Order, Sir, for me to reply to the observations of the hon. Gentleman?

MR. SPEAKER: I should not have permitted the hon. Member to have gone so far as I did if I had not known that there was a sort of sanction to what he said on the part of the Board of Trade.

MR. BRYCE: May I take it from what you have said, Sir, that I am at liberty to make a few observations?

MR. SPEAKER: If there is a difference of view.

MR. BRYCE: In the nature of a response to the appeal made to the Board of Trade, I should like to say that I am glad that, by the ruling of Mr. Speaker, the Motion cannot be brought on, and that the hon. Member has not attempted to bring it on, for, whatever are the merits of the case, I should have considered it my duty to warn the House of the danger and imprudence of interfering with the procedure of Committees of the House, except in special cases—that is to say, in cases where questions are raised which could not be brought before the Committee or large public interests are involved. With regard to the appeal of the hon. Gentleman, I will say just this. I understand that the people of the district through which the new line will pass are greatly in need of railway accommodation. The attention of the Board of Trade has been called to the matter, and we are of that opinion. I understand the Railway Company have given some sort of indication that they will endeavour to bring about what is desired. On the part of the Board of Trade I can assure the hon. Member that, recognising the need that exists for passenger traffic along the line, they will consider it their duty to take every proper means of pressing upon the Company the necessity and desirability of opening the proposed line for passenger traffic as soon as they can possibly do so. That is to say, as soon as they have obtained, with or without Parliamentary powers, connection with the Taff Vale system. I hope that will be sufficient answer to what the hon. Member has said.

SIR T. FRY (Darlington) said, he desired to say a word on a personal matter. He understood the hon. Member (Mr. A. Williams) to say that the Committee had been placed in a position of great difficulty. He could assure the House that the Committee never had the slightest difficulty in coming to a decision. The same result was arrived at both before the Railway Commissioners and the Committee of the House of Lords.

QUESTIONS.

"THE COSTA RICA PACKET."

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is now in a position to state the purport of the latest Despatch from the Netherlands Government with respect to the claim for compensation submitted on behalf of the captain of the Costa Rica Packet?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): I hope to be in a position to give some information in a few days.

IRISH ORDNANCE SURVEY DEPARTMENT.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he is aware that a Circular has been issued by the Director General at Southampton approving of a reduction in the staff of Irish employés; and that a monthly notice has been given to those men, but no reference has been made to compensation although they have been in the service from five to fifteen years; and whether the Government intend to pursue this practice of summary dismissal in the Irish Ordnance Survey Department?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): I have made inquiry into this matter, and I find that it is not the case that any Circular has been issued on the subject of the reduction of the Ordnance Survey Department in Ireland, nor is there any practice of summary dismissal such as that suggested in the concluding paragraph of the question. A certain limited number of men, both in Ireland and in England, have received a month's notice, because their services are not required for the completion of the programme of the present year, which entails the employment of an increased number of engravers instead, and possibly the question of my hon. Friend is based upon this fact. It is not, of course, possible for me, in view of the varying character of the work of the Survey, to guarantee permanent employment to every man whom we temporarily engage, and in the circumstances I do not think the notice given can be said to be unreasonable. It would certainly be my wish that in the exercise of a difficult duty every possible consideration should be shown to the men concerned, and I am glad to say that in some cases the men will be entitled to gratuities under the Superannuation Act of 1887.

SALES UNDER "THE GLEBE LANDS ACT, 1888."

SIR J. SAVORY (Westmoreland, Appleby): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he will arrange that notices shall be given to the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty of sales proposed and effected under "The Glebe Lands Act, 1888," and whether he will direct a fuller Return of proceedings under the Act in the form submitted to him by the Governors?

MR. H. GARDNER: Under the Glebe Lands Act of 1888, the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty are entitled to receive notice of an intended sale in every case in which they are mortgagees or creditors of the benefice, and I have made special arrangements with a view to see that the requirements of the Act in this respect are duly complied with. I cannot enter into any general engagement as to the notification to the Governors of the receipt of applications to sell glebe lands in other cases, for reasons which I have explained at length in a letter which I have addressed to the Governors on the subject, but I shall be glad to supply such information as to sales effected under the Act as will enable the Governors to keep up full and sufficient records respecting the augmentations made by them, and I propose that the officers of my Department should confer with the officers of the Bounty Office as to the means by which this may be most conveniently effected.

BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS REPORT.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Bovine Tuberculosis Report may be expected to be issued? and in putting it I should like to remind the right hon. Gentleman that this is about the sixteenth time I have asked it.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): I am afraid I can only give an answer such as I have given on previous occasions.

MR. FIELD: Is this matter ever going to be finished?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: That does not depend on me. I can only give the answer of the Commissioners.

VISCOUNT CRANBORN (Rochester): I recollect this question being raised two years ago.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: The Commissioners are now considering their Report.

MR. FIELD: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman bring any pressure to bear on the Commissioners?

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): Is not the proper opportunity to raise this question on the Vote for Public Commissioners?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: Certainly.

STEEL COMPANY OF NEWTON.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE (West Ham, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether any Government orders have been placed with the Steel Company of Newton; whether he is aware that the steel dressers employed there have been on strike for over 13 weeks for an advance of $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per hour, the present rate being 6 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. and the recognised Trade Union rate in the district 6 $\frac{3}{4}$ d.; and that the places of the men on strike have been filled by labourers who are being paid 18s. per week; and whether the Government will at once put the Fair Wages Resolution of the House into force?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): The Steel Company are executing some work for the Admiralty, some of this being under a sub-contract with Messrs. J. and G. Thomson, of Glasgow. A complaint as to the wages which they pay under that sub-contract has been lately received through the Secretary for Scotland from the Associated Iron Dressers of Scotland, and is now under consideration at the Admiralty.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, seeing that the Army and Navy Estimates annually presented to Parliament give the exact numbers of the Regular and Auxiliary Forces, Ships, and Seamen maintained by the United Kingdom for the defence of the Empire, and that the exact sum required for their pay, equipment, and training is voted by the House of Commons, as also the capital and annual cost of all Imperial fortifications and other defences, and that like information is published by all foreign nations, he will consent to inform the House, as a guide to adequately providing for Imperial defence, to what extent local assistance can be counted on from the self-governing colonies in the event of any emergency arising, and what has been the capital, and what is the annual expenditure incurred on these heads by Canada, Australasia, New Zealand, Cape Colony, and Natal?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I cannot say what amount of local assistance would be forthcoming from each self-governing colony for Imperial defence in the event of any emergency arising, as it would largely depend on the nature of the emergency. But there can be no question as to the spirit of the colonies, and their readiness to assist the Mother Country, as was evidenced by the numerous offers of help received from all parts of the Empire during the operations in the Soudan. As regards the capital and annual cost, I will obtain the information the hon. Gentleman desires and forward it to him.

THE PLAGUE AT HONG KONG.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is in a position to state as to the present aspect of the plague in Hong Kong; and what steps have been taken by the authorities in that colony to safeguard the sanitary condition of the inhabitants?

MR. S. BUXTON: A telegram was yesterday received from the Governor of Hong Kong reporting that an improvement has taken place, and that the epidemic is abating. The total mortality to date has been 2,215. Despatches have just been received reporting as to the first outbreak, and the earlier stages of the plague, which appears to have been introduced into the colony from Canton. Energetic steps were taken by the Colonial Authorities to cope with it by the provision of special hospitals, the employment of additional medical men, a house-to-house visitation, and the regular flushing and disinfecting of all drains and infected houses. As regards the future, steps are already being taken to consider the question whether the water supply of the colony needs to be supplemented, to reduce the risk of future visitations of this kind.

THE ALBION COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, seeing that close on 300 men and lads have been killed in the Albion Colliery explosion in Wales, and that the surviving relatives include a large number of widows and children, and other dependent relatives, the Government will vote whatever sum may be necessary to supplement any private funds which may be raised, in order to provide those rendered destitute by the explosion with an adequate subsistence?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT,
Mr. S. Buxton

Derby): The facts of this lamentable case have been carefully considered, but it is too early for me to express an opinion upon it until the facts are more fully ascertained.

THE ATTERCLIFFE VACANCY.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government will give an indemnity to Mr. George Hill Smith, the Unionist candidate for the Attercliffe Division of Sheffield, to Mr. Frank Smith, the candidate of the Independent Labour Party and Federated Trades Council, and to Mr. Battey Langley, the official delegate of the Government Whips, in respect of their election expenses, should the Committee find that the grant of the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds to a person in a wrong name invalidates the Writ issued at the Government instance on Tuesday last; and, if not, how they will recover their expenditure should the election be declared null and void?

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): On a point of Order, I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is in Order to insert the statement in a question, "Official delegate of the Government Whips," a statement which is notoriously false?

*MR. SPEAKER: I entirely agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman, and had I seen the question it should not have appeared on the Paper in that form.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The answer to the question is in the negative.

THE CUSTOMS AND FOREIGN PRISON-MADE GOODS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that the people of the United States, Canada, and other democratic communities prohibit the importation of all goods, wares, articles, and merchandise manufactured wholly or in part in any foreign country by convict labour, and that the proper authorities are authorised by law to make such Regulations as are necessary for the enforcement of that provision; could he explain why Her Majesty's Customs are alleged to be less competent to distinguish prison-made goods than the Customs officials elsewhere; and if he has consulted the Heads of the Customs Service on the matter?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): No, Sir; I have no information as to the practice of the Customs Authorities of the United States or Canada on the point referred to, though I believe that the so-called M'Kinley Tariff Act of the United States contains a provision forbidding the importation of prison-made goods, and that a similar provision exists in the recent Canadian Tariff Act. I do not know to what other States my hon. Friend refers in his phrase "other democratic communities." As at present advised, the Board of Trade do not know by what means it would be possible for the Customs Authorities of this Kingdom to determine whether goods imported in the ordinary course were or were not made in prisons abroad.

THE THAMES IRONWORKS.

MR. BENN (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): On behalf of the hon. Member for North West Ham, I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Admiralty, after the recent statement made by the manager of the Thames Ironworks to the effect that his firm is prepared to build an ironclad at 20 per cent. less cost than the Government can do it when working overtime, is prepared to give an undertaking that some share in the construction of the next ironclad shall be given to the Thames yards in view of the distress prevailing in the East End of London, of the necessity of maintaining the existence of the present yards on the Thames as repairing stations in time of war, and of the well-known quality of the London work?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The practice of the Admiralty, when ships are to be built by contract, is to invite tenders from selected firms, and to give the preference to those who tender lowest, provided that they fulfil all other necessary requirements, including conditions as to workmanship, date of delivery, and the other points usually specified when tenders are invited. Therefore, we cannot promise to give a preference, on the next occasion, either to the Thames Ironworks Company or to any other firm. Any such preference, or any departure from the present practice of competitive tenders, would open the door to suspicions of favouritism and jobbery, and would be highly undesirable in the public interests. The fact that lack of work and consequent distress has existed in certain shipbuilding districts is much to be deplored. But this condition is not peculiar to London. It is not admitted that the work for the Navy in the London district has been superior to that done elsewhere; for example, in Scotland and the North of England, where the recent orders have been placed with thoroughly competent firms. Nor do we admit that the Thames Company can build a battleship 20 per cent. cheaper than it can be built in a Government yard. It is not true that in order to build the dockyard battleships the men will have to work night and day. Overtime is being kept within very reasonable bounds, and is only resorted to temporarily in cases of necessity.

COMMANDEERING IN THE TRANSVAAL.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): May I ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he has received any further information as regards the present Mission of Sir Henry Loch?

MR. S. BUXTON: I am glad to be able to state that Sir H. Loch, who has been in personal communication with President Krüger at Pretoria, telegraphs that the South African Republic have agreed not to commandeer any more British subjects, and to enter into a Convention giving us a Most Favoured Nation Clause as regards military service. They have also agreed to extend the existing Swaziland Convention for six months. I must be allowed to express my indebtedness to those hon. Members who have more than once postponed their questions at my request.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS AND THAMES SHIPBUILDING FIRMS.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to a letter which appeared in yesterday's Daily Chronicle, from the Managing Director of the Thames Iron and Shipbuilding Works, in which it is stated that the tenders sent in by that firm in December last for the construction of the Powerful and the Terrible were only £5,000 in excess of those of the successful competitors on the Clyde on a total of about £550,000; whether the construction of one of the new first-class battleships was offered to, and declined on the score of insufficiency of price by, a large Clyde firm, which was not the lowest on the tendering list, but that no similar offer was made to the Thames firm; whether the Thames firm expressed its willingness to construct one of these vessels at a less cost than the lowest price quoted from the North for the sake of finding some remedy for the distress prevailing amongst the workmen of the Thames; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Paper specifying what firms were invited to tender for the new ships, what the amounts of the tenders were, and which of them were accepted?

MR. KEIR-HARDIE: At the same time, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to a letter published in the daily papers of Thursday, the 28th June, signed A. F. Hills, Chairman and Managing Director of the Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company (Limited); whether the tender made by this Company for the two first-class cruisers Powerful and Terrible was only £5,000 in excess of those accepted, and the tender price was £550,000; whether the Thames Ironworks tender included French tubulous boilers of an experimental type which added £50,000 to the cost, so that deducting this sum the tender of the Thames Ironworks Company was £45,000 under that of the firm which received the contract; whether the Admiralty offered a Clyde firm which was not in the tendering list one of the ships to be built, and whether a similar offer was made to the Thames Ironworks firm; and, if not, will he explain for what reasons; and whether, in the interests of the 5,000 men out of work in consequence of their action, the Admiralty will reconsider the matter with a view to send one or more of these ships to be built in the East End of London?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The statement that the tender sent in last December by the Thames Ironworks Company for the Powerful was only £5,000 in excess of those of the successful competitors is not correct. The difference was much larger. The Thames Company also offered an alternative and lower price, but not as much as £50,000 lower than their tender for the ship as designed, upon a proposed design of their own with different boilers. But the introduction of tubulous boilers was an integral part of the design for which tenders were invited. The tubulous boilers as adopted in the Powerful and Terrible are not experimental. But it is useless to quote or discuss a tender upon a design not proposed or wanted by the Admiralty. Any tender that could be entertained must be in accordance with the design. I now turn to the case of the tenders for two battleships. When these had been examined in March an offer was made to a Clyde firm, as indicated in the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Bromley, because that firm was among those who had tendered lowest. The same offer was made at the same time to another of those who had tendered lowest—the latter firm accepted; the former declined. A similar offer was then made to a third firm, also one of the lowest tenderers, and accepted. The Thames Ironworks Company were not among the lowest tenderers, therefore no such offer could be made to them. Nor was any offer made to any firm not in the tendering list. After both the battleship contracts had been placed, the Thames Ironworks Company made proposals to build a battleship for the amount of the lowest tender or somewhat less, and asked for the transfer to them of the order for one of the battleships provided for in the dockyard programme. This proposal could not be entertained, because it would have deranged that programme and left one of the dockyards with insufficient work for the employment of its workpeople, thus necessitating their discharge in large numbers. With regard to the last question of my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Bromley, he will recognise that the amounts of tenders which are not accepted cannot be published without a breach of confidence. But, as I have before stated, a Return will be presented, as soon as all the contracts are complete, which will give the amounts of the actual contracts made, as well as the name of each contractor.

MR. MACDONALD: May I ask whether, in view of the fact that the Managing Director of the Thames Ironworks Company has published the figures in connection with the tender of that firm, the right hon. Gentleman will state by how much that tender was in excess of the tender of the Clyde firm?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I cannot be a party to publishing anything prematurely. The amount of each contract actually made will appear in the promised Parliamentary Return.

MR. ALLAN (Gateshead) asked by whom the royalty for the French boilers was paid?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The royalty is part of the price which the Admiralty have to pay for the work.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE: Is it the case that the Thames Ironworks Company have been building these ships for many years past and have drafted a large number of skilled workmen into the locality; and is it a fact that, in consequence of the Government orders having been withdrawn from the firm, nearly the whole of these men have been out of employment for nearly two years? Will the Government give serious consideration to this matter?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: All has been done that could be done. The Company have been invited on every occasion to tender. They must take their chance with other firms as to whether they are successful or not. I much regret that workmen on the Thames should be out of work, but that is also the case in other parts of the Kingdom.

MR. KEIR-HARDIE: Is it not the case that this firm have offered to accept the tender for one of the ships on terms equal to the lowest terms accepted, and should not that remove the difficulty which appears to stand in the way of the Government?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I have already explained how the case stands. The Thames Ironworks Company was not among the lowest tenderers, and therefore they were not successful.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): Is it the custom to allow tenderers to revise their tenders and so to bring them down below a tender which has been accepted?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Such a course would be most objectionable. Sometimes, of course, there are circumstances which make the lowest tenderers unacceptable.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Were the Company in question among the lowest tenderers?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: They were not only not among the lowest, but they were very much higher than those whose tenders were accepted.

WIMBLEDON RIFLE RANGE.

MR. MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that on Monday last, 25th instant, whilst a large number of children and their parents were enjoying a holiday treat on Wimbledon Common, a bullet was heard by Harry Harvey, one of the rangers of the Common, and a young lady artist who was sketching at the time near to Queen's Mere Lake, at five minutes past 5 o'clock, passing a few feet over their heads, being a spent bullet shot from the rifle range near there; and whether he will, if this be the case, countermand the order he has recently given for practising on this range until the Committee now taking evidence upon the subject has made its Report?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): No, Sir. The incident referred to in the question has not been brought to my knowledge, and in the absence of more definite information I am not prepared to stop practice at the ranges. I expect in a very few days to receive the Report of the Committee appointed to consider how far the ranges can be safely used.

PEERS AND THE NEW LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT.

MR. CORNWALLIS (Maidstone): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board how a Peer who is owner of property in a parish, but does not occupy such property, is to have his name inserted on the list of parochial electors for that parish, seeing that his name is not inserted on either the Parliamentary or Local Government registers?

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.—(No. 190.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 28th June.]

[TWENTY-SECOND NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 31.

Amendment again proposed, in page 19, line 5, to leave out the words "reduced by a sum equal to one-tenth part thereof," in order to insert the words, "assessed on the nett profits derivable from an estate."—(Mr. Newdigate.)

Question again proposed, "That the words 'reduced by a sum' stand part of the Clause."

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had very many times affirmed that the principle of his scheme was equality of treatment as between realty and personalty, and whenever an Amendment was moved in favour of realty it was met by the argument that, as there must be equality of treatment, the Amendment could not be accepted. What they were asking for was that realty should be treated on the same footing as personalty. Personalty could claim to be assessed to the Income Tax on the profits made, and their object was that realty should have the same benefit. The landowners have been twitted with not having conducted their affairs in a business-like way. By this Amendment, however, they were asking that landowners should be allowed to manage their estates in the same way as commercial businesses were managed, and be subjected to taxation on the same principle as traders. It was most unfair, when they asked for this equality of treatment, that it should be refused to them on the ground that it would involve an increase of Government machinery to meet that demand. That meant that a demonstrable inequality was to be maintained because the machinery of the Government was inadequate to the discharge of necessary duty. Surely it would be enough to ask for delay until the machinery could be increased. The right hon. Member for St. George's, by his Budget, gave farmers the option, on the production of accounts, of being assessed under Schedule (D) as though they were traders, and many Scotch farmers and some English farmers had availed themselves of this privilege. There was a good deal of misconception as to what was really meant by the difference between the gross income and the net income of an estate—that was to say, when it really reached the pockets of the landlords. In one case in which he had verified the items the gross income was £2,917 and the net £1,279. The difference did not include a single farthing for luxuries, nor for the maintenance of the mansion and grounds, for keepers or for stables; it included simply the expenditure without which the estate could not be maintained, and without which the estate would not yield any income. In another case in which there was more cottage property the gross was £700 and the net £500. Then, coming to a typical small property, he found a case in which the income was £707 a year, which it took a sum of no less than £533 to maintain. Such cases showed that the Amendment was based on the principle of justice and equality, and its supporters impaled the Government on the horns of a dilemma, which was that they denied equality because of the defects of their machinery, or they refused to amend their machinery in order to do justice. It might be urged that this Amendment was impracticable, and that they were not going the right way to gain the end they had in view. He could not, however, accept that as conclusive, because if what they asked for was an act of justice it stood to reason that the machinery of the Government ought to be altered so that their end would be met. It might be said that they could make a better bargain for those who had entrusted their interests to them if they fell back on a subsequent Amendment. Until these arguments were put before him in support of the subsequent Amendment he must support the Amendment before the Committee.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) said, he had given much attention to this matter, and he hoped to be able to convince his hon. Friend that it was not only necessary in the interests of the Revenue, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer properly stated last night, but it was also in the interests of the taxpayer that this Amendment should not be pressed. On the whole, his view was that the matter should be dealt with on the basis adopted by the Government. It had been universally admitted that a deduction for repairs should be arrived at in some way or another from the gross assessment under Schedule (A) before the Income Tax was levied. The Government had proposed that this deduction should be made upon a fixed scale such as that which had reference to assessments to the poor rate; but his hon. Friend behind him had proposed that the actual expenditure should be allowed in every individual case according to the system which now prevailed in reference to Schedule (D) of the Income Tax, and that the person assessed should be compelled to prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Income Tax—which in practice generally meant to the satisfaction of the Surveyor of Taxes—that a certain sum had been expended for repairs, which might be allowed by way of deduction from the assessment. They were not now discussing the question of principle, but only the way in which it could be applied. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had very properly contended that as a matter of practice it would be impossible for the Commissioners of Income Tax to apply this principle in the 8,000,000 separate cases of assessment under Schedule (A). He must say that he thought the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman were very forcible. Would the House let him put the other side of the case? How would it be with the taxpayer if the Amendment were accepted? He thought it would be felt to be an intolerable nuisance to the large number out of the 8,000,000 persons who were separately assessed, who were occupiers and not owners, if they were compelled to prove every year in every case the amount that not they, but the owners, had expended on repairs to the property for which they were assessed, before the deductions from the tax were allowed. No doubt, as every owner of landed property knew, repairs might amount to a very large proportion of the rent received if repairs and improvements were reckoned together. It was very difficult to separate them; for he had hardly ever spent any considerable sum in repairs without also making improvements, and that, he thought, would be the experience of most people. Therefore, if the Amendment of his hon. Friend were carried, it would make it necessary that the occupiers who were assessed should divide the amount of money spent upon repairs to the property by the owners from the amount spent upon improvements. He expected that if they did that the amount expended in repairs would not come up to the percentage anticipated. But that was a matter for future discussion, not for discussion upon the present Amendment; and he thought with regard to this a forcible argument had been urged by his right hon. Friend the Member for the Sleaford Division, when he pointed out the effect of the enormous decrease of rental of agricultural properties in the last 10 years. It had happened in many cases that the gross rental of agricultural property assessed to Schedule (A) was now only half the amount it was 10 years ago, though repairs remained the same: so that the proportion of the gross rental which had to be expended in repairs would be much greater now than 10 years ago. That was a fair argument, which he was sure would be considered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer when they came to deal with the question of what the percentage of the allowance which was to be made should be; but he was bound to say he thought his hon. Friends were advocating an Amendment which would cause a great deal of difficulty in proposing that the allowance should be on the system adopted in Schedule (D) instead of on the basis proposed by the Government. He did not think the average allowance for repairs under Schedule (D), which was closely limited by the words of the Act, amounted in practice to more than 10 per cent. He thought his hon. Friends were making a mistake in pressing forward their view as against the basis which the Government had adopted; and if he might venture to do so, he would express to them his earnest desire that the Amendment should be withdrawn, so that they might take a fresh discussion on the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in course of which they might perhaps be able to convince him that he ought to go somewhat further in the direction of doing justice to agricultural properties.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk) said, he was very sorry to have to disagree with his right hon. Friend who had just sat down. He would not, however, have risen, except that he thought he saw a way out of the difficulty. He was quite aware that the question was not now to be discussed as one of principle. It was one of administration, possibility, and convenience. So far as the logic of the case was concerned, there was no reason that he could see why a single word should be said against the Amendment of his hon. Friend. Equity required that as traders had their Income Tax levied upon their net income, that landowners should not be treated in a different manner. They were not a class by themselves to be treated specially by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The answer to this Amendment seemed to be that the Income Tax Commissioners could not afford to take the time and trouble necessary to give effect to it. Up to that moment it appeared to him that the Amendment had not been read in its proper connection with the Bill. He did not think any hon. Member would maintain that there were 8,000,000 separate occupations of land in the country. Of course, the fact that the Amendment dealt only with land was a blot upon its logical perfection, but it did away with the argument that 8,000,000 separate assessments would have to be dealt with. The land in this country was in comparatively few hands, and it would not be necessary to count each occupation. When counting the assessments under Schedule (D) the Inland Revenue authorities did not count each separate shop or business, but they counted the number of traders. In the same way, under Schedule (A), it would not be necessary to count each occupation of land, but only necessary to count the number of owners. It was necessary to make certain deductions from the assessments, and all the Amendment asked was that when the assessments were reconsidered for the purpose of making these deductions they should be reconsidered on a rational basis—the basis of making them correspond with the value of the land. In a case where there was one owner but a large number of occupiers, it would be more convenient to collect money from the one owner than the multiplicity of occupiers.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not deny the abstract justice of the proposal, and the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir J. T. Hibbert) had said that if it could be carried out it would be an equitable arrangement. Under those circumstances, he (Mr. Lawson) would offer to the Committee his suggestion as to the best method of carrying it out. There was an Amendment standing a little lower down on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for the Loughborough Division of Leicestershire (Mr. Johnson-Ferguson). That Amendment proposed to make it optional whether the owner of land should accept the concession of the right hon. Gentleman under Schedule (A) or place himself under Schedule (D), and it also proposed that when the assessment was once made it should be valid for seven years. If the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to receive that Amendment favourably he (Mr. Lawson) thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Newdigate) would be well advised in withdrawing his Amendment. If the only objection to the Amendment was that it would largely increase the number of assessments required to be made, it was obvious that the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Loughborough Division would meet that objection. He was sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer desired that there should be equality in his proposals, but there was no way of making the tax fall equally unless it were made to fall upon the net income of all classes, and not merely upon the net income of traders. He hoped that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not intimate that he would accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Loughborough Division, his hon. Friend (Mr. Newdigate) would adhere to his Amendment, as it appeared to be the only means Members had of protesting on behalf of the landowners that they desired to be treated on the same footing as the traders.

MR. JOHNSON - FERGUSON (Leicestershire, Loughborough) said that, after what the hon. Member, who had just sat down had said, he thought he should not be acting honourably to Members opposite if he allowed them to withdraw the present Amendment on the supposition that he would afterwards move his. After hearing what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said as to the absolute inability of the officials of Somerset House at present to undertake the collection of this revenue under Schedule (D), and the remarks made by the right hon. Member for Bristol (Sir M. Hicks-Beach), he did not think it would be fair to the Committee for him to move his Amendment and waste the time of the Committee by its discussion. He thought they would have certain facts of importance to bring forward when they discussed the Amendment standing next on the Paper, and he hoped the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Newdigate) would either allow a Division to be taken at once or would withdraw the Amendment, so that the Committee might proceed to discuss matters of more practical importance.

COLONEL BRIDGEMAN (Bolton) said, he entirely disagreed with his right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol (Sir M. Hicks-Beach). His right hon. Friend had referred to the difficulty of discriminating between what were properly described as an improvement and what ought to be described as repairs. The real test would be whether there was any increase in the rent in consequence of the money being spent upon the property. All large owners of agricultural land knew that whatever improvements they made, and whatever money they spent upon such improvements, they obtained no increase in their rent-roll. No doubt Members who took an interest in agriculture would have noticed the evidence given a few days back by the Duke of Richmond before the Royal Commission on Agriculture. The Duke mentioned the immense sums spent in late years on his large estates, and showed that there had been no increase in his rent-roll in consequence of his expenditure. In a case of this kind he (Colonel Bridgeman) thought that the alterations effected must be regarded as necessary repairs, and not as improvements that added to the value of the property. There was no addition to the value of property unless the rent-roll was increased.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, he wished to join in the appeal made by his right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) to the hon. Member for the Nuneaton Division (Mr. Newdigate), that he should withdraw his Amendment and allow the Committee to proceed to business. It was quite clear that it was impossible to carry the Amendment. He (Mr. Heneage) had himself intended originally to put down an Amendment of the same description, but having, like the Member for Bristol, looked very carefully into the matter, he saw so many objections to it that he had refrained from doing so, and had put down a different proposal. No doubt the system suggested in the Amendment would be much more equitable to landlords than the system proposed in the Bill, because under it everybody would get practically what they deserved to get, whilst under a hard-and-fast line those who deserved the least would get the most, and vice versa. He thought the Committee ought to try and get some extension of the deduction proposed by the Government.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, the right hon. Gentleman had attributed to his right hon. Friend (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) language which he certainly never used. It was quite true that his right hon. Friend had expressed his opinion that the Amendment would not effect its object, but he had not said that the Committee in discussing it was not engaged upon real business.

MR. HENEAGE said, he had not meant to say that. What he had meant was, that the subject was pretty nearly threshed out, and that it would be better now to divide upon it and proceed with fresh business.

MR. W. LONG said, the Amendment raised a very large question. It was clear from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the speech of his right hon. Friend (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) that there was no difference between the two sides of the House as to the desire to meet the owners of agricultural land as fairly as they could be met and to have regard to the exceptional circumstances in which they were situated. The speeches that had been delivered from the opposite side of the House and by his right hon. Friend (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) had been addressed to the practical difficulties in the way of adopting the Amendment. He (Mr. Long) was very unwilling to look a gift horse in the mouth or to show any want of appreciation of the desire of the Government to meet the owners of real estate, and he was also very reluctant to find himself differing from his right hon. Friend (Sir M. Hicks-Beach), for whose opinion and guidance he had always had the greatest respect; but he could not help thinking that it would be desirable to adopt the Amendment. It had been admitted that the justice of the claim was fairly established, and, that being so, he thought hon. Members had a right to discuss, not at any undue length, a proposal of such importance. Under this Bill a man was to be taxed not according to the amount he received, but according to the value of the estate from which he received it. This principle was not carried out in regard to the Income Tax, but the position was a very unsatisfactory one. He would take two cases of men succeeding to large landed estates. In the first case the property had been kept in good order, while in the other instance the reverse was the case, and the successor had during his tenure transferred a very large sum quite out of proportion to his receipt in bringing the property into a proper condition. The policy of the Government, however, was to ignore the fact that the man had to pay so largely for succeeding to an estate in this condition, and to fix an equal percentage of deduction for both the cases he had mentioned. The man who had to spend a large sum in keeping up his estate for the benefit of his successors, and for the benefit of the community at large, was to be allowed no larger deduction than the man who, on succeeding, found everything in good order, and consequently had a much larger income to spend. It therefore worked out in this way: that a man might pay a large Death Duty, and pay a large sum in respect of repairs, whilst his neighbour, paying possibly a small sum for Death Duty, would get a larger income, and would have exactly the same remission. That was an illustration that must be familiar to everybody who had watched the history of landed estates in this country. It pointed to the fact that, if the difficulties in the way of some such system as that the hon. Gentleman had pointed to were only of administration, they ought not to stand in the way. The Committee had now become tired of listening to the complaints and sorrows of the landed interests, but that was only because they were anxious to conclude their business, and did not care whether land was injured or whether it was not. But he could assure the Committee that this new taxation, which was falling on land, would be felt very seriously. It was possible that the large number of assessments the Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to formed an insuperable objection, but he would make one suggestion. He would suggest that a remission might be made on the form in which the Income Tax-payer proceeded when he claimed that he had been unduly taxed by allowing the owner of real estate to appeal to the Commissioners in instances where it was thought that he had been unduly assessed, producing at the same time a statement of outgoings in connection with the property showing what was the net remainder of the receipts. This remedy was a rough-and-ready one no doubt. The surveyors had hitherto insisted, with considerable determination, on maintaining what they believed to be correct, and the owners of property had not thought it necessary to press their case intensely. But now the position would be changed. The taxation would be increased, and the owners of real estate, already overburdened with taxation, would be inclined to appeal to the Commissioners. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer could see his way to go beyond the fixed amount of remission in the case of owners of real property who were heavily burdened, through no fault of their own, he would be taking a course which, without a doubt, he would be glad to take. In 99 cases out of 100 the burdens had been created not for the enjoyment of the tenant for life, but in order to improve the property—in order that the farms might be better arranged and more usefully occupied by the tenant. Whether through payment of interest on mortgages or payment on the up-keep of estates he ventured to say that the position of landowners was a very hard one at the present time. He gladly and cordially acknowledged that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had in a previous speech shown the Committee that he was fully alive to the difficulties under which they were labouring, and he (Mr. Long) believed that if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to dispose of the administrative difficulties he would find it an easy matter to adopt his suggestion. If the Amendment led to any such result as that, hon. Members would feel that their time had not been wasted. If on the other hand the right hon. Gentleman was unable to make any concession of the kind, they could only hope that what had passed on this occasion would have prepared him to be a little more generous towards land when they came to deal with the fixed amount of remission. When the right hon. Gentleman had said that they were proposing especially advantageous terms to property in houses he forgot that he himself differentiated between the ownership of land and houses. Therefore, in whatever suggestion they had made they had only been following the right hon. Gentleman's example.

MR. HENEAGE said, it was hard that he should be accused of not giving reasons for what he had said. He had accepted the speech of the Member for Bristol as explaining exactly the views he held himself. What he had said referred to the great inconvenience and well-nigh impossibility of differentiating between improvements and repairs. He believed that the most practical way of dealing with the question was the mode which the Government had proposed, though he hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be a little more liberal.

MR. GOSCHEN: I think it almost due to hon. Gentlemen on this side—the Chancellor of the Exchequer having especially alluded to me yesterday—that I should say a few words on this question. I agree with my hon. Friends on this side of the House in thinking that this is an extremely important question, but the difficulty is whether allowances will ever be satisfactory to constitute an average. The circumstances of estates are so different that allowances which would be ample and generous in one part of the country would not cover the justice of the case in another part of the country, or on different kinds of estates. That is the difficulty in which we find ourselves. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will, I think, admit that it is not a question of giving more or less money, but how to distribute it, and the representatives of property are themselves not agreed what will be the best mode of distributing it. I think the Committee will feel, looking at the importance of this case, that this discussion has not been a waste of time, even though hon. Members may not carry their point, and that it is the case that the administrative difficulties are insuperable. Two different points of view have been laid before the Committee—one by the right hon. Member for West Bristol, and the other by the right hon. Member for Sleaford. It is thought in the one case that it would be an advantage to land to have a fixed allowance, and in the other that it would be of advantage to accept the Amendment. What is clear is this—that on those owners of property where the outgoings are very large no system of average can ever be perfectly satisfactory, or can come home to their sense of justice. The whole House will be agreed upon this, that if we could do it, it would be desirable that no man should be taxed on a higher income than he actually makes. What my hon. Friends feel is that the system proposed by the Government is one which, with every desire to be equitable, can scarcely meet that sense of justice which they think is involved in this case, and it is necessary to prove to them, I think, more elaborately than has been done by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—if he will allow me to say so—and to bring home to them very distinctly, that every effort will be made to make additional arrangements to meet the administrative difficulties alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman. Hitherto the matter has not perhaps been of so much importance, because land is favoured as regards the Death Duties, and has put up with this injustice. I think, so far as the present system is concerned, it must strike anyone whose business is in land that he must pay upon an arbitrary assessment, while a man whose business is in trade pays upon the exact amount he makes; and nobody can have listened to the speech of my hon. Friend, who moved this Amendment last night, and who pointed out the deductions which are enjoyed by trade, without feeling that those who trade in agriculture, corn, and cattle, are placed in a very difficult and disadvantageous position as regards their assessments. The Government reply that the administrative difficulties are so great that the proposal would practically take the whole Income Tax to pieces, and that a different system would have to be inaugurated. I think the difficulty with regard to the 8,000,000 assessments is not precisely that put by the right hon. Gentleman, because if you were, by a change in the system—which I admit would be a very great change—to deduct the individual owner of the property, then, of course, you enormously diminish the number of persons with whom you have to deal, and you might more easily arrive at an administrative system on this basis; but I must frankly say that from all I have learned the reconstruction of Schedule (A) on this Paper is a matter that could not be taken in hand in the course of a few months. I understand that the administrative difficulties connected with the Death Duties will be enormous. The Department will have the reconstruction of a vast system of taxation, and to put two reconstructions upon them would, I gather from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, almost break them down. It is extremely difficult for myself to contend against a declaration of that kind; but if that is so, I should wish to follow up what has been said by my hon. Friend who has just sat down, and that is, whether the Government cannot consider whether, in cases which are not covered fairly by the average, there are not certain claims which might be entertained on the principle that the Government does not wish to tax incomes above their real amounts. The Committee will be aware that where abatements of rent are made by the landowner, he may appeal for a return of the tax. Then there is the question of Land Tax. I know some very high authorities say that there are few bad debts in land. I do not know that myself; but at all events we know that in Ireland the losses from arrears are extremely great, and it does seem to me an injustice, not only upon the landowners, but upon any class of the community, if bad debts are to be treated as income. We heard yesterday that bad debts are allowed in trade, and I throw it out as a suggestion whether the case of bad debts should not be allowed to be considered by landowners in the same way as bad debts are allowed to be considered by other classes of the community, and whether some system cannot be devised by which men should not pay largely more than they themselves receive. It is no answer to say that the Government must have an average. Notwithstanding all the years I have been at the Treasury, I have never been able to see the justice of an average as regards the taxpayer, though in regard to the Death Duties an appeal has had occasionally to be made to an average. The argument that it would be against the State is one which will never come home to the taxpayer himself, and the fact that the allowance which may ultimately be arrived at is one which is a fair average can scarcely be conclusive as regards bad debts. I cannot support the Amendment of my hon. Friend, because it has been stated so strongly that Schedule (A) would entirely break down under it; but although it cannot be accepted, at the same time the Debate has shown that there are strong reasons for considering whether, in the case of estates where a much larger tax is imposed than the amount actually received, in some way or other arrangements could not be made to diminish the injustice which, I am sure, no one would wish to see exist.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am sure gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House will be pleased at the prospect that at some future time—an early future time—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's will be ready to re-construct the Income Tax. [Mr. Goschen: I never said so.] But he has also very fairly admitted the great administrative difficulties and changes which the Amendment would involve, that in order to carry it out it would be necessary to revolutionise the whole system of the Income Tax; in fact, that it would be necessary to devise a new Income Tax altogether, and to place it on a new basis entirely. The present Income Tax is levied, as I pointed out not long ago, not upon the owner, but upon the occupier, and the occupier has the right to recover the tax from the owner. The great mass of these assessments depend upon that ground. The Income Tax authorities have no such knowledge as would be required by this Amendment, nor have they the means to acquire it. Therefore, you must revolutionise the whole basis of the Income Tax; the Amendment would practically destroy the plan of the Income Tax. I do not complain at all that this matter has been brought forward for discussion; it is a very proper one to be considered, and the discussion may throw light in the future upon the changes which may possibly be made. I do not express any opinion upon that, but I will ask the hon. Member who has made this Motion not to press it, for he must see that it cannot succeed, and even if it does it will be impossible to carry it out at the present time. I shall be perfectly ready to discuss the matter with hon. Members. There is one point I should like to observe upon. What the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's said on the subject of land is true. Any average charge may be too much for one man and too little for another, but for convenience of collection every Local Authority acts upon that principle. I do not propose to discuss this matter further now. I hope the hon. Member will be satisfied with having so ably brought it forward, and I hope he will also be satisfied with what has been said by two Ex-Chancellors of the Exchequer, that it is a thing which cannot now be done practically, and that he will allow us now to proceed with the other proposals on the Paper.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk) said, that this matter had been discussed principally by those who were directly interested in land. As one who had the smallest possible connection with land, he would like to say a few words before it was disposed of. This Bill absolutely revolutionised the position land had hitherto held in the taxation of the country. There had been undoubtedly very good reasons why there should be a distinction between the principle on which the Income Tax was levied on trade and that on which it was levied upon land. Land had had a benefit hitherto which personal property had not had, and now when both were placed in the same position he thought it was right that at the earliest possible moment the system of taxation should be equalised on both forms of property in regard to the Income Tax as well as the Death Duties. His experience had relation to trading and manufacturing concerns and not to land, but he could not possibly see why the manufacturer owning a factory, whether a Joint Stock Company or an individual, should be allowed, as at present, to place to the debit of his manufacturing account all the costs and charges to which he was subjected in earning his profits, while the landowner whose plant was his land was not allowed to deduct the sums expended in draining and hedging that land. He thought the system of an average allowance might be most unsatisfactory and unfair between one part of the country and another, and it also might be most unfair to the trading interests. There could only be one safe system of justice to go upon, and that was to find how much went into a man's pocket which he was able to spend from the occupation in which he was engaged. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had urged that there were administrative difficulties in the way. He quite understood that there were 8,000,000 assessments, as had been stated, but there were not 8,000,000 individuals concerned. There were 8,000,000 estates and tenements in this country, but they belonged to a comparatively small number of people. Now the tax was raised from the occupiers, and as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said he did not know who the owner was and did not care, because he got his tax from the occupier. But why should not the owner of that property make just the same return to the Income Tax Commissioners that traders had to make? Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be in this position as against the property owner, which he did not occupy as against the trader: that he could compel the occupier of the property to return to him the name of the owner and the amount of rent paid, and thus check the returns of the owner. He admitted that there were administrative difficulties in undertaking a scheme of this sort at once, but where there was a will there was a way, and he was satisfied in collecting the tax from the property owners the right hon. Gentleman would have a better security and a better check than he possibly could have in the case of the trading classes. He would give an illustration which had occurred within the last two or three days, with the object of showing how unfairly the present system of taxation worked in the levying of the Income Tax upon traders as compared with landowners. A large manufacturing undertaking was built up by advertising; the cost of that advertising was a trade expense, and that was deducted yearly from the income. But what did they see as the result of judicious difficulty with regard to the 8,000,000 assessments is not precisely that put by the right hon. Gentleman, because if you were, by a change in the system—which I admit would be a very great change—to deduct the individual owner of the property, then, of course, you enormously diminish the number of persons with whom you have to deal, and you might more easily arrive at an administrative system on this basis; but I must frankly say that from all I have learned the reconstruction of Schedule (A) on this Paper is a matter that could not be taken in hand in the course of a few months. A large manufacturing undertaking was built up by advertising; the cost of that advertising was a trade expense, and that was deducted yearly from the income. But what did they see as the result of judicious advertising? It was this: that while a man deducted this as a charge over a number of years before he paid Income Tax, yet in due time he was able to sell the property for £750,000—simply the result of judicious advertising, on which he had paid no Income Tax. The right hon. Gentleman had no doubt seen in the papers this week this case of a very large manufacturing concern, which was known all over the country, which simply by this advertising had been able to sell the property divided into two parts—the manufacturing and goodwill. The advertising had brought it a goodwill of £700,000, which was a trade expense. Now that amount did not come as income; it came as capital, and all those charges which had been deducted from the cost in years past would be only liable to Income Tax in future on the dividend derived from the goodwill which had accrued. The question might have arisen whether that advertising was a fair and just charge, but he thought there could be no doubt that all persons engaged in trade had a right to make that deduction; but why should not the landlord when he undertook charges and costs to improve his estate have a right to make these charges? He admitted that it might be impossible to carry it through at present, but a social distinction ought not to be drawn between the two kinds of property, and they should be put on the same level footing as regarded taxation.

MR. NEWDIGATE said that, after the sympathetic answer which he had received from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would ask permission to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. STRACHEY (Somerset, S.) moved, in page 19, line 6, to leave out "one-tenth" and insert "one-sixth." He said, he thought the Committee had now come to a subject which could be discussed practically, after the almost academic discussion they had had, although he entirely agreed with his hon. Friends on the other side of the House who were anxious to have an assessment under Schedule (D). He would have willingly supported any such Amendment had it been practicable. But the fact that the hon. Member had not pressed it to a Division showed, he thought, that the hon. Member himself did not believe it to be practicable. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had truly said that from the difficulties of the case at present it would not be practicable to apply Schedule (D) to them. He thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the concession he had made on this point. His only complaint was that the concession had been one-tenth instead of one-sixth. He could not see what reason there could be why land had not as good a claim to have one-sixth reduction as house property. He knew he would be met with the argument with regard to local assessments, but he ventured to agree with the hon. Member for the Derby Division of Liverpool, who had said that that argument had very little to do with the question. The points they had to consider was whether a sufficient deduction was given to the land in consideration of the expenses in keeping it up as a going concern. They were told that this 10 per cent. ought to be enough; but when they considered the expenses of management and repairs, and insurances, and also the rates which had to be borne, it would be admitted, at any rate by those who had a practical knowledge of the subject, that it was impossible to manage an estate by an expenditure of 10 per cent. It would be nearer 20 or even 30 per cent. He could not help thinking that some people were inclined to suppose that this was merely a question of reduction on the land without any buildings. But they had got to consider that land included farm-houses and other buildings, and also cottages. As regarded farm-houses, they were increasing in size and comfort, and more money had to be spent upon them. The same remark applied to outbuildings. As to cottages, as a general rule, they were let with the farm and were assessed with it, so that under the proposal as it stood there would only be a reduction of one-tenth in regard to cottages. In a large number of counties the cottages were assessed with the farms, so that the remissions ought to be extended from one-tenth to one-sixth. He contended that it was perfectly impossible for land properly managed—having regard to the charges for repairs, insurance and general expenses—to be maintained at a sum in amount less than the 16 per cent. which was given in the case of house property. Hitherto he had voted consistently in every Division for increasing the Death Duties on real property, because he considered it was not right or proper to tax personal property at a heavier rate than real property. It had always seemed to him that there should be no distinction drawn between capital invested in land and capital invested in shares, or Railway Stock, or Consols, and that the only argument in favour of any exemption of land was that it was unfairly taxed under Schedule (A). Now when they were equalising the Death Duties in all cases, then he ventured to think the assessment for Income Tax ought to be levied in the same way, and that incomes from capital, whether derived from land or business, ought to be treated in exactly the same manner. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 19, line 6, to leave out "one-tenth," and insert "one-sixth."

Question proposed, "That 'one-tenth' stand part of the Clause."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that his hon. Friend in moving this Amendment, and he thought hon. Gentlemen opposite, had been good enough to acknowledge that in the proposals the Government had made they had desired at least to do, what appeared to them, justice to the landed interest. He should like, first of all, to state the grounds upon which the Government made the proposals which were contained in the Bill upon this subject. Of course, they endeavoured to ascertain as well as they could what might be considered a fair deduction in cases of this kind. They went, first of all, to the best authorities to which they could go—namely, Committees of this House, who had carefully, on evidence, examined this matter; and, in the second place, they went to the Local Authorities who had themselves dealt with, if not exactly identical questions, at all events cognate questions in regard to this matter. Dealing first of all with Committees of this House, he would refer to a Committee which sat in 1861 upon the question of the Income Tax, and upon this very point of the deduction that ought to be made under the Income Tax so as fairly to give the owner of the land the net value. There were some gentlemen present—the right hon. Member for St. George's and the right hon. Member for West Bristol—who would remember the efforts of Mr. Hubbard on this question. His hon. Friend who moved this Amendment said he could not see why there should be any difference made in the allowances upon land and houses. He ventured to say his hon. Friend in that respect differed from everybody who had ever considered this question. Everybody who had devoted attention to the subject had seen that there must be a distinction between land and houses. Mr. Hubbard was Chairman of the Committee which sat on this subject in 1861, and in his draft Report he said this—

"The proportion of rent which, upon an average of years, is expended for the maintenance of dwellings, buildings, and fences connected with landed property, has been variously valued by the surveyors called before your Committee at 6, 8, and 10 per cent. Until such outgoings have been defrayed, the landowner cannot be said to have a net rent available for his expenditure, and your Committee recommend that upon the rent of all lands (requiring building reparation) an abatement be made of one-twelfth part ($8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.) prior to assessment."

Therefore, Mr. Hubbard came to the conclusion, upon the evidence of surveyors, that $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was a sufficient and proper allowance to be made. When he (Sir W. Harcourt) saw that Report, he determined, especially having reference to the existing condition of agriculture, to take not $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., but the highest maximum figure which was given by the surveyors at that time, and that was why he put 10 per cent. in this Bill. The hon. Member did not see why a distinction should be made as between houses and lands, but the reason for that was stated by Mr. Hubbard in the following terms:—

"The assessment of houses is attended with more injustice than that of land, for not only are the outgoings in insurance and repair proportionately heavier, but the irregularity with which the law is itself administered involves at times serious loss to the house owner. The maintenance of house property in its full value implies insurance against fire, the annual repair, and the ultimate renewal of the fabric when decayed by age; and the proportion of rent absorbed by these outgoings is estimated by Mr. C. Lee, a surveyor of lengthened experience, at an average of 15 per cent. upon house property of all ages and all descriptions. His estimate was, in the main, concurred in by Mr. Vigers, while Mr. Clutton rated the outgoings at $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and Mr. Hunt at 20 per cent. In corroboration both of the policy and of the amount of the proposed allowance for outgoings

Mr. Lee notices that in assessments of house property for the poor rate he has habitually deducted 1½ per cent., and that in every case of rating brought judicially before the Court of Queen's Bench allowances have been made for these purposes. Apart, however, from the taxation on outgoings, a further injustice is sometimes inflicted by charging Income Tax on the amount of rates and taxes paid by the landlord for houses let by the year, or for shorter terms; but this defect of administration can easily be remedied by providing the assessors and surveyors with more definite instructions. Your Committee recommend that, prior to the assessment of houses, an abatement be made of one-sixth part for outgoings from the assessable value."

It would be seen, therefore, that the allowances in the present Bill were upon a higher scale in regard to both lands and houses than that which was recommended by Mr. Hubbard in his Report. Then there was another Committee which sat in the year 1867, and a very powerful Committee it was. The Chairman was his right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers), whom, unhappily, they now very seldom saw in the House. Among its Members were Mr. Childers, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Hibbert, and other gentlemen very well fitted to form a judgment on this matter. He would read from the Report of the proceedings of this Committee the clause with reference to the allowance to be made on land—

"Motion made, and Question, 'That the deduction under this class be 10 per cent.'—(Mr. Beaumont,)—put, and agreed to."

On that occasion 10 per cent. was put as the maximum deduction upon an authority not at all adverse to the interest of land. He did not rest there, because it might be said, and it had been said, that the circumstances had a good deal altered, and that they ought to look to what may be called the highest authority, because the Union Assessment Committees had what he might call an upper House in the County Council Assessment Committee, and the County Council assessments were made with very great care by able men, who were fully competent to deal with these matters. He would take two counties, the County Councils of which were under the direction of two friends and colleagues of his, and he thought he might say without dispute that they might be regarded rather as model counties in their administration. One was the County Palatine of Lancashire, over the County Council of which his right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham was Chairman, and the other was the County of Northampton, his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty being the Chairman of its County Council. In the County of Lancashire the deduction for the assessment of land with buildings upon it was 8½ per cent.; in the County of Northampton, which was a purely agricultural county, it was 10 per cent. It might be said that in taking Lancashire he had taken a county which was wholly a manufacturing and industrial county. That was not so. A good many parts of that county were as purely agricultural as any in England, and there it was rather remarkable to see that they took the deduction on land, with or without the County Council assessment, at 8½, and they took buildings at 16½ per cent. He had taken their estimate for buildings. As he had said before, he had raised the allowance on land beyond that which this figure gave. He did not look merely at the County Council assessments, but he examined the assessments of the various Unions in the county, and what did he find? He found in almost all these rural assessments the allowance for land was much lower than the County Council assessment, though he believed the Union assessments were taken upon the Income Tax valuation. In the Chorley Union the allowance on land without buildings was 5 per cent.; in the West Derby Union, 5 per cent.; Preston Union, 5 per cent.; Garstang, 5 per cent.; Lonsdale, 5 per cent.; Ulverston, 5 per cent. Land without buildings was taken there at 5 per cent. If they took land with farm buildings, they found in Chorley the allowance was 4½ per cent.; West Derby, 5 per cent.; and in other Unions land with buildings was put at 7½ per cent. Therefore, the Committee would see that in none of these Unions did the figure approach that which the Government had put in the Bill. It might be urged that he should have gone to the South and inquired as to what was the custom in counties nearer home. He had done so. In the County of Berkshire the deductions were 2½ per cent. on land without buildings and 10 per cent. on land with buildings. In the West Riding of Yorkshire the deductions were 7½ per cent. on land, woods, &c., and 15 per cent. on dwelling-houses. Mr. Hubbard, endeavouring to arrive at the net value of property for the Income Tax, came to the conclusion that a fair deduction would be $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. He (Sir W. Harcourt) had taken the maximum, and he assumed that the County Councils, when they had taken the Income Tax assessment for their purposes, had done so in the belief that they were adopting a fair average figure. All the evidence showed that 10 per cent. was as large a maximum as had ever up to this time been considered just or fair in this matter. But there was one argument which had been addressed to him by the right hon. Member for Sleaford which, he confessed, seemed to him to be deserving of consideration and of weight. The right hon. Gentleman said that these assessments and those allowances were just in former times; but the income from agricultural land having decreased, and in many respects the expenses remaining the same, the ratio of the allowance might be regarded as too small. That was a fair argument, and he hoped in the course of these discussions he had not shown himself otherwise but accessible to fair arguments. He made a concession the previous night to the British farmer in the matter of Income Tax by putting him on a level with the farmers of Scotland and Ireland. Having considered the question raised by the Amendment, he could not do what it proposed. He could not put land on the same footing as houses, because it was plain that the outgoings upon houses must be larger than upon land. He had shown how clearly that was the opinion of the assessment authorities, who had always made a great distinction—a distinction in almost all cases double and in many cases threefold more being given to houses than to land. The 10 per cent. in the Bill, which was the maximum, he had intentionally taken; but in consideration of the difficulties under which he knew the landed interest had suffered, and in compliance with the arguments addressed to him by the right hon. Member for Sleaford, he was prepared to extend that 10 per cent. and accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for the Woodbridge Division (Mr. Everett) and to make the deduction one-eighth instead of one-tenth, and so raise the maximum, in consideration of the depression from which the agricultural interests had suffered. He thought that was an allowance which meant a considerable sacrifice to the Revenue; but it was a sacrifice to the Revenue which, upon consideration, he thought he could make without any serious derangement of the finances of the country. That being so, he was willing to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Woodbridge Division, and he hoped hon. Gentlemen opposite would agree to this as a satisfactory solution of the question.

MR. WARNER (Somerset, N.) wished, in the name of those who represented agriculture on his side of the House, to thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the concession he had made. Of course, those connected with the management of property would know that one-eighth did not come up to the amount expended in repairs on any agricultural property, and that they ought really to get the same as was allowed in the case of houses—namely, one-sixth. Speaking from personal experience, he could assure the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the expenses for repairs on houses were very slightly in excess of the amount expended for repairs in connection with agricultural property. There were charges under the head of “repairs” on land in respect of drainage, bogs, gates, and ponds, and that was land on which there were no sheds at all. When they came to consider sheds for cattle, barns, silo pits, and so on, the expenditure on repairs was necessarily much greater. The concession made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a large one—larger than they had had a right to expect—and he (Mr. Warner), for one, was only too ready to thank him. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman or some succeeding Chancellor of the Exchequer would consider this question in any future Budget which might be brought forward, to see if something further could not be done to equalise taxation on land and personal property. After the concession which had been made he trusted the Committee would not divide on the Amendment.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright) said, that he also could express a certain amount of satisfaction at the concession the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made, but at the same time that satisfaction was qualified. He maintained that the very essence of the Bill was equality of personalty and realty, and unless they had a very considerable concession that equality would not exist. If there was one thing clearer to him than another, it was, that though they might not this Session be able to have equality of Income Tax, it was absolutely certain that the next Chancellor of the Exchequer—or the present if he were in Office next year—would have to re-arrange all the Income Tax assessments. The existing difference between personalty and realty could not remain in its present position. The main argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was based on Mr. Hubbard's Report of 1861; but the right hon. Gentleman hardly seemed to give weight to the fact that all the expenses in connection with the land had largely increased since that date. Wages had in a great many parts of the country far more than doubled. Improvements in consequence were far more expensive now than they were then. They also had doubled, and the incomes of the landlords as well as of the farmers were considerably diminished. On these grounds alone he could not conceive that it was possible to compare the present year with 1861. He was in great hopes that in regard to this question the Debate which had already taken place on these points, and the Debate which no doubt would arise on others to-night, would show the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he could never rest in his present position, and that a final settlement would not be arrived at until large remissions were given to landed estates. Any one who possessed such property, and had done his duty in building good cottages and farm-houses, knew that the outgoings came to more than 16 per cent. It was all very well to say in regard to house property, "There must be certain outgoings," but the same was the case with the land. Landowners got nothing for the cottages they kept up in the rural districts. On all farms in Scotland a certain number of cottages had to be maintained, and there was not a farthing of rent paid for them. If the Bill passed as proposed, it would be to the interest of the landowner to provide inferior cottages, and that he would do if he were not guided by higher motives. His object was to give the labourers comfortable cottages and enable them to live happier lives; but inferior cottages that might be built at half the cost of the present cottages could be supplied. The landlords would of course decline that system, and their interests ought to be fairly considered. They did not ask for favours but they wanted what they did acknowledged. They asked not for favour, but for justice—that if a landlord did his duty by his estate he should not be handicapped by unfair legislation. He held that the reduction ought to be more than 12½ per cent. That was altogether inadequate; it might have been sufficient in 1861, but it would not do in 1894. He hoped and trusted that though they had got this concession it would not be considered a final settlement. It was no settlement at all of the question. They ought to maintain their ground and respectfully ask the Government to reconsider the question. If the Government did that with a view to putting realty and personalty on an equality they would give a remission of at least 20 per cent.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I am very glad to recognise the conciliatory and friendly spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman has met the objections which have been raised to this part of the Bill. But although I am glad to do that, and although the right hon. Gentleman has admitted the injustice under which we have laboured up to now, and under which we should have laboured under the Bill as originally drafted, I hope he will not think me ungrateful if I say I do not think we can regard the concession which has been made to us in the light of a final settlement. We are glad to take all that we can get; that is only natural. I do not for a moment mean to adopt any other attitude. We accept with all the gratitude it deserves the concession the right hon. Gentleman has offered to us. My view is that it is not a question of percentages at all; in view of the cases I have endeavoured to submit to the House I fear that an adequate treatment of our view can only be arrived at by deducting from the receipts from an estate the actual necessary outgoings for maintenance. It is, as has already been pointed out, useless to refer to the Committee of Mr. Hubbard of 1861, because the condition and circumstances of to-day have entirely altered from what they were then. What might have been perfectly fair and adequate in 1861 may be totally unfair and totally inadequate in the year 1894. Since the right hon. Gentleman was good enough to make his concession I have roughly estimated what its effect will be on an estate that is worth, say, £1,000 a year. I will submit my estimate to the House, and I think it will be seen that we still have a grievance. We are to be allowed a deduction of one-eighth of the income for deduction. According to the view I submitted to the House last night on a great number of estates the rental has fallen 80 per cent. since 1861. The rent which was formerly £1,000, therefore, would only be £200. Twelve and a-half per cent. allowance on a rental of £200 would leave the amount to be assessed at £160 a year. But the outgoings would be precisely what they are to-day—namely, £80 a year. It is on that £80 a year alone that we ought to be taxed. Still, after the right hon. Gentleman has made his concession, we shall be taxed on the income of £160, one-half of which we absolutely never receive at all. That I believe to be an absolutely fair statement of the position, and it seems to me that the only fair treatment which could be meted out to us would be to make an allowance equal to the necessary amount of outgoings on an estate. That being my view of the matter I do not intend to press the right hon. Gentleman any further on the point. I have stated my view as fairly as I can. The right hon. Gentleman has gone a small distance in meeting us for which I am grateful to him, but there is another question in relation to the subject which I think I am entitled to raise if my statements as to the position of landowners under the Bill cannot be disputed, and I do not think they can be. In the case of traders deductions are made for bad debts. Why cannot the same sort of thing be done in the case of landowners? Are there no such things as bad debts in the case of landowners at the present time? If the right hon. Gentleman were in a position to obtain anything like an accurate account of arrears of rent he would find that they amount to a large sum.

SIR W. HARCOURT: They are not taxed.

MR. CHAPLIN: It is the estimated rental you are taxed on. If deduction is to be made in respect of all arrears my objection falls to the ground.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Such deduction is to be made.

MR. CHAPLIN: Then there is no necessity for me to say anything further on the point.

MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge) said, that they had taken the hardest side of the Budget first, and they had now got to the kindly side of it. He was glad they would be able to agree when they reached the end of the arguments upon the Bill that agriculture would, on the whole, have reason to rejoice over the proposals of the Government rather than to mourn over them. It was to be remembered that though the Death Duties were the hard side in being chargeable upon real property—such property not having been charged to them before—yet those duty had regard to estates left by the dead, while the remissions made, which the Committee were now discussing so pleasantly, would be enjoyed necessarily by the living. It was also a pleasure to remember that such little amounts as agricultural labourers had been able to save—and he was glad to know that not a few had been able to save money—would pay less in the form of taxation than they had paid hitherto. With regard to farmers, the Government not only gave them relief with regard to the property they were likely to leave behind them, but also with regard to their payments of Income Tax under Schedule (B). They had now come to the landowning clauses, and a very sensible relief was to be given in their regard. He himself, as connected with the agricultural clauses, felt very thankful to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the considerate disposition he had exhibited towards them. He hoped they would accept with gratitude the offer the right hon. Gentleman now made. There was a great deal to comfort agriculturists in the Budget.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster) asked whether the Committee had rightly understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that arrears of rent would be treated as bad debts?

SIR W. HARCOURT was understood to reply in the affirmative.

MR. HENEAGE: You have to pay on the rental; then the arrears are allowed for.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: The tax is levied on the rental value, and deductions are afterwards made.

*MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley) said, that he was sorry he could not join in the chorus of gratitude to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in regard to the concessions he had made to land on this Amendment. It seemed to him that the young landed aristocracy on that (the Ministerial) side of the House were about as reactionary as the landed aristocracy on the other side of the House. He had recently understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that he had now come to an end of all his concessions; therefore, he had listened to the right hon. Gentleman's speech in this Debate with some sense of security. Those who were specially interested in the question of land had thought that they would come out of this speech safe from the impositions always laid upon them, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them just now that the concession made involved a loss to the Revenue. The Committee must be aware that that loss would have to be made up somewhere, and those whom he (Mr. Byles) represented, he was afraid, would have to pay in order to relieve the land of its burdens. He desired, himself, to say that he was not in favour of relieving the land of any of its burdens. [Laughter.] On the contrary, he was strongly in favour of laying on the land much heavier burdens. [Renewed laughter.] Yes; he even believed that the whole of the burdens of the State should be laid upon the land. [Laughter.] He was not surprised that these statements should be received with derisive laughter, but he ventured to predict that the day would come when many more men would rise up in that House to express a similar opinion. He knew, at any rate, that there was a large number of people in the country who believed that that must be so, and he thought that they would send more and more representatives to this House. He liked the Budget because it was recognised in it that the land should pay a greater share of the burdens of the State. He looked upon the Bill as an earnest of what might yet be to come. Why did he do so? [Laughter.] He wanted to know what title any landlord had to the land save it was that he should devote the rent to the benefit of the community. [Laughter.] Landlords sat at home and other people worked upon the land and produced for them their income. Did they suppose that they would be entitled to incomes that nature——

*MR. CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must point out that the Question before the Committee is the alternative choice between one-tenth and one-sixth.

*MR. BYLES said, he had only been betrayed into the explanation of his observations by the mockery with which his observations had been received. He felt that it was due to the Committee that he should not make a statement, which was considered false, without attempting to justify it. He contended that the people would sooner or later realise that for any individual to attempt to take away from those who worked upon the land the result of their labour, the result of the sun, and of the rain from heaven, was a state of things that must end. A day or two ago, in the Debate on the condition of Essex, the landed gentry opposite told them that farms were going out of cultivation, and they asked the Government to intervene to prevent this condition of things. He would reply that the only thing which prevented land from being cultivated successfully in Essex was the landlord. If the landlord were to go away, the land would soon be cultivated. If the labourer got on it, he would render it productive and remunerative. He (Mr. Byles) would call the attention of the Committee to the words of the great Russian writer, Count Tolstoi, who said—

"There were men who would do anything for the poor except get off their backs."

Hon. Gentlemen opposite were continually posing as friends of the poor, but to his mind they would do well to remember the proverb of Count Tolstoi. It was the landlords only who were in the way.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the observations the hon. Gentleman was now making did not arise out of the Amendment.

MR. BYLES said, that for these reasons, bowing to the Chairman's ruling, he objected on principle to the concessions which were being made, not because he had any animosity to the individual landowners—he objected to the burden of taxation upon the shoulders of the landed interest being lightened.

*MR. STRACHEY said, that in view of the concession the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been good enough to make, he should ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

SIR J. DORINGTON (Gloucester, Tewkesbury) said, that after the singular exhibition of hostility to the landed classes they had just witnessed, he thought he ought to point out that the rent derived from land was not produced merely by "rain and sunshine," but was the result of careful attention, and often large sums of money were expended by a landlord for improving the quality of the land.

*MR. BYLES said, he did not wish to see any improvement of the landlord taxed. Of course, the value of the improvements should be allowed.

SIR J. DORINGTON said, it could be proved in very many cases that the whole of the present rental was barely the value of the landlord's improvements. His object in rising, however, was to deal with a subject the Chancellor of the Exchequer had introduced, as to the distinction between gross and net value. The right hon. Gentleman had founded an argument on the Report of Mr. Hubbard's Committee of 1861, but he (Sir J. Dorington) ventured to say that the whole of that argument was now somewhat out of date. It certainly was rendered so by the Bill they were now discussing. The object of the Bill was to establish absolute equality between personal and real property. That was not the object in view when the Income Tax was originally discussed. The Income Tax was distinct as bearing upon land and as bearing upon personalty. It was different in form, machinery, and allowances, and the State made a great difference in its own favour in levying the tax on land as compared with personal property in consideration of the advantages that land had in other respects. No doubt, however, land had had an advantage up to the present time as regarded the imposition of the Death Duty. He could not accept the view that rates were an hereditary burden any more than any other form of taxation. The State had derived great advantage from the imposition of the Income Tax. The difference in deduction between the gross and the rateable value was the sum which was supposed to be necessary to maintain the estate in a lettable condition. Insurance was not taken into account in the rateable value.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is taken into account in all these deductions.

SIR J. DORINGTON said, it was quite certain that the management expenses and expenses incidental to the estate other than repairs were not included in the deductions made as between gross and rateable value, and if they really wanted to arrive at an equitable ratio they must get the same amount of deduction in regard to income as was allowed under Schedule (D). The late Leader of that House on one occasion stated that the difference was equal to the difference between 7d. and 9d.—a difference of 28 per cent. That was much more than they now proposed, but he did not suppose that they would get anything further from the Chancellor of the Exchequer now, so he accepted with gratitude that which had been conceded, although, of course, they hoped, before long, to get further concessions. What they wanted was to be dealt with in the same way as traders themselves, under Schedule (D).

*SIR H. MEYSEY - THOMPSON (Stafford, Handsworth) said, he was rather pleased to hear the frankly cynical speech of the hon. Member for the Shipley Division, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had, a few evenings ago, practically accused him of being one of a party who wished to throw part of their burdens on to the shoulders of other people. Now, the hon. Member—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I explained at the time that what the hon. Gentleman said was not in Order.

*SIR H. MEYSEY-THOMPSON said, he would try to confine himself to the observations of the hon. Member on the Budget proposals.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must address himself to the Amendment.

*SIR H. MEYSEY - THOMPSON said, that though he did not wish to appear ungracious with reference to the concession of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he must enter his protest against 12½ per cent. being considered a fair amount to deduct from the income of land for the purpose of the Income Tax. They certainly could not accept that as a settlement in full. He, for one, held that 12½ per cent. was nothing like sufficient. He was bound to point out that, assuming a fall of 33½ per cent., which had certainly taken place in the rental of most arable farms, it took 50 per cent. more acres to produce the same rental. For instance, an income of £9,000 per annum was produced by an estate of 6,000 acres at 30s. per acre, but at 20s. per acre it required 9,000 acres to produce £9,000 a year. Also the charges for repairs and other expenses had considerably increased per acre.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Motion of Mr. EVERETT, the following Amendment was agreed to:—

Page 19, line 11, after "occupier," insert "or assessable as landlord."

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, that in order to illustrate the effect of this and to the previous clause he would cite the case of an estate of £1,500 gross annual value which, under the first portion of the Bill, would be valued at 23 years' purchase, and the net value would be £27,600. The amount of the new duty on that estate would be £1,242, which might be met by an annual insurance premium of £31, the owner receiving, on the other hand, under this clause £6 0s. 9d. off the Income Tax. That was the exact outcome of the suggested equilibrium.

*MR. JOHNSON-FERGUSON (Leicester, Loughborough) urged the Chancellor of the Exchequer to see whether the same advantage could be extended to land used for the purposes of forestry as was extended to land employed for the purposes of husbandry. This was certainly a most important matter and nothing should, in the future, be allowed to stand in the way of the extension of our woods and forests.

MR. RENSHAW protested against the injustice that was being inflicted on Scottish farmers under Schedule (B.) While the Income Tax was being raised on the Scottish farmers it was being reduced in the case of the English farmer. Instead of its being as hitherto 3½d. on the English farmer and 2½d. on the Scotch farmer, each would now pay 3d.; of course the English farmer did not object, but he was bound to protest on behalf of the Scotch farmer.

SIR W. HARCOURT disputed the correctness of the hon. Gentleman's view of the change in the Income Tax as it affected the English and Scottish farmer, and recommended to his attention the old saying, "Is thine eye evil because I am good"?

MR. WINGFIELD-DIGBY (Dorset, N.) also supported the view that had been urged with reference to land under forestry. He thought that in these days when so much land was going out of agricultural cultivation every facility should be given for the extension of woods. The hon. Member further asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he could, with a view to saving time, insert a short clause dealing with property which ran into two separate districts.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the Inland Revenue Department would be very glad to receive any suggestion from the hon. Member in reference to administrative forms such as those to which he had referred. As to forestry, he could assure the hon. Member that he had all his sympathies, for he loved trees and would do all he could to preserve them. He believed that in the not very distant future one of the wants of the world would be wood. Wood was, in his opinion, being consumed too fast all over the world, and even in America the time was coming when its scarcity would be felt. Anything that could be done to remove existing disadvantages in regard to forestry would undoubtedly be to the public advantage.

MR. WINGFIELD-DIGBY: I want the right hon. Gentleman to do something more practical than give us his sympathy.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 32 to 36 agreed to.

Clause 37.

LORD G. HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing) moved to leave out Sub-section (2) of the clause. He remarked that the clause had nothing to do with the Customs and Inland Revenue of the year, and that this was the first time in his experience that such a proposal had been tacked on to a Budget Bill. As the clause was a financial innovation, he asked the attention of the Committee in order that they might understand its object. It was to Sub-section (2) that he desired to draw their special attention. Not half-a-dozen Members on either side of the House on reading the clause would have the slightest idea of its object; and if the words of a clause did not convey its meaning, certainly the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in introducing the Bill did not elucidate it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, no doubt, made a speech of great ability and lucidity, as they readily acknowledged. The one principle to which the right hon. Gentleman had attached importance was the necessity of paying his way by making the Revenue of the year meet the Expenditure without having recourse to the pernicious system of borrowing. But the Committee would be surprised to learn that this clause gave the Government power to borrow, and it proposed to raise a certain sum, and place it upon the National Debt, contrary to the existing law, and the amount of money thus unnecessarily placed upon the National Debt was to be brought into the Revenue of the year for the purpose of creating a fictitious surplus. The Financial Statement of the year showed in the final balance-sheet a payment from the Naval Defence Fund of £289,000, which was included in the Revenue of the year, and on the other side an estimated surplus of £291,000. This payment of £289,000 gave the Chancellor of the Exchequer his surplus. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had frequently spoken of the Naval Defence Fund as one which was very much in debt, and ought to be wound up, and it was a very remarkable and clever piece of finance to extract £289,000 from a fund which was in debt. He would like to point out how that very ingenious operation was performed, and in so doing he would like to remark that as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had had an enormous amount of arduous work thrown upon him lately—he had to succeed a most distinguished man as Leader of the House—and having had to introduce what was probably the most contentious Bill of modern times, this complex question had doubtless escaped his notice. In introducing this matter, therefore, he must not be understood as making any personal attack on the right hon. Gentleman. The expenditure under the Naval Defence Act was to be met in a certain number of years by annual instalments, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had only proposed, under the exceptional circumstances of the day, to capitalize the instalments of this year and next year, there would not be so much objection. But under the pretext of paying old debts, the right hon. Gentleman was really creating fresh ones for the purpose of getting a surplus. Under the existing law that sum of £289,000 ought to be applied to the reduction of the debt under the Act. That debt amounted to £3,146,000, and it ought thus to have been reduced to £2,857,000. But in that case the right hon. Gentleman would have had nothing, so he had wound up the accounts by taking all the debit balances, and had transferred them to the National Debt, while he had brought all the credit balances into the financial year. The result was, that he increased the National Debt to the extent of £289,000. If it was wrong to borrow it was still worse to borrow surreptitiously, and his complaint was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer under this clause was borrowing, by appropriating money which by law should go to the redemption of Debt, and putting it into the Revenue of the year. That was not the only objection. The Treasury under this clause seemed to have taken upon themselves a dispensing power—putting themselves above the existing law. Hitherto Finance Bills had been retrospective only with reference to the financial year to which they related. But this Bill gave the Treasury a dispensing power with regard to a law relating to the finance of last year. That was a very dangerous innovation. His Amendment, if carried, would, no doubt, greatly reduce the Chancellor of the Exchequer's surplus, but it would not upset the Budget. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman did not wish by this Budget to inaugurate any financial irregularity, and he therefore hoped his Amendment would be accepted.

Amendment proposed, in page 21, line 29, to leave out Sub-section (2).—(Lord G. Hamilton.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (2) stand part of the Clause."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he was extremely obliged to the noble Lord for the observations which he had made, although he could not agree with his view of the Naval Defence Act and its consequences. Long before he was in Office he had spent many weary hours in endeavouring to understand that document, and he found that the authorities at the Admiralty and the Treasury shared his difficulty in making head or tail of it. According to the admission of everybody who had to deal with it, that Act had brought the finances of this country into a state of confusion such as they had never been in before. One of the minor advantages of the Budget was that it was a winding-up of the Naval Defence Act. That Act would disappear from the face of their finances, and there was no one who did not think it would be a very good riddance. The real truth was, that the Naval Defence Act was a plan for borrowing money and charging it upon a future Parliament. The noble Lord spoke about borrowing. But the surpluses of the late Government for three years consisted of nothing but borrowed money. The plan of the Naval Defence Act was to charge the Revenues of the year with £1,500,000 for seven years, and to spend the money in five years. That was a very ingenious process of making the two last years pay for expenditure which did not belong to them. In other words, they left a debt of £3,146,000, and what was now proposed was to apply the Sinking Funds applicable to the payment of debt to the payment of that sum. It was as much a debt as that which was incurred by Lord North or Mr. Pitt, and therefore the Debt Fund had been applied to its liquidation. One of the incidents of the winding-up of the Naval Defence Account was that there happened to be a sum of £289,000, which had been borrowed in past years, more than was required. That could not be applied until the account was wound up. The Government proposed to pay off the whole debt, and having discharged the Revenue of its liability this sum, which would have gone to the payment of the debt, fell into the Revenue. There was nothing illegitimate or irregular in that transaction. It had been done on the advice and at the suggestion of the most experienced authorities of the Treasury—Lord Welby and Sir E. Hamilton. These gentlemen were not in the habit of violating the law or of setting an example of a pernicious character in regard to the finances of this country. He would give the Committee the figures. The amount borrowed was £3,146,000, and the amount taken out of the taxes up to the 31st of March last was £7,143,000. Thus the total paid into the Naval Defence Fund was £10,280,000. He hoped that under the circumstances the Committee would approve of the Government's winding up the account and discharging the debt, and so relieving the Treasury and the Admiralty of the infinite complications brought upon them. He could not accept the noble Lord's Amendment, and he hoped that under the circumstances it would not be pressed.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he had rather hoped, although he did not quite expect, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have confined himself to the real point raised by his noble Friend—namely, the £290,000 which was the object of the Amendment. But the Naval Defence Fund was a favourite subject with the right hon. Gentleman. The object of that fund was not what had been suggested, but it was to secure continuity of shipbuilding by the construction of a large number of ships in consecutive years. Another object of the Naval Defence Act was to put the House of Commons into possession of the full plans of the Government, and to let the public know from year to year what they would have to pay. On the other hand, the system which the right hon. Gentleman was so proud of was to inaugurate a programme with regard to which the British public was entirely in the dark, and which would have the effect of landing them next year in a large outlay for which not the slightest provision had been made. That liability and outlay had been incurred, but no particulars had been submitted to the House of Commons. When the Conservative Government was in Office the Naval Defence Act showed what the liabilities were. They did not know that now. Given the assets, the Government did not take the trouble of submitting to Parliament the question whether they would or would not incur the liabilities. He thought a sensible and business-like public would prefer the system of the Conservative Government to the mysterious and dark system of hon. Gentlemen opposite, under which they were absolutely ignorant of the liabilities which they were incurring. It was bad finance so to construct your Budget as to land you in a large expenditure next year with regard to which no provision whatever was made. He took the opportunity of saying that some frank words which he uttered at an earlier stage had been misrepresented as if he had made a repudiation of the whole principle of the Naval Defence Fund and the arrangements therein made, and had described them as unstatesmanlike. Not at all. All he suggested was that the annuities might have been spread over a different term of years; but he stood by the Naval Defence Act entirely. It was a bad example hon. Gentlemen set when a public man acknowledged a mistake in one particular, as regards spreading the expenditure over three or five years, to magnify what was intended to be a frank statement, and to turn it into political capital. As regarded the allegation that no one at the Treasury or the Admiralty understood the Naval Defence Fund, he objected to the Chancellor of the Exchequer sheltering himself behind the permanent officials. The right hon. Gentleman told the Committee that his plan was approved by Lord Welby and Sir E. Hamilton, but did he tell them of the many occasions on which these distinguished civil servants differed from him, and might have criticised the action he had taken in the House of Commons? They were always entitled to know what the opinions of the permanent officials were. For the two officials named he had the greatest respect, and nothing had surprised him more than that they should have endorsed this scheme. The application of the £290,000 was perfectly unprecedented, and even according to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer it would be clearly seen that the expenditure of the year was not met out of the Revenue of the year. The right hon. Gentleman spoke about past surpluses, and very stupid nonsense was talked about surpluses created by a debt. Some people did not appear to know what a surplus meant. A surplus was what remained after the calculation made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer between the expenditure and income of the year, and if there had not been the arrangement of annuities why, of course, the means must have been found of dealing with the position. After the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the statements that have been made by my noble Friend and myself, there is not a single person opposite who will not clearly see that the expenditure of the year is not being met out of the Revenue. Why, then, do we hear this stupid nonsense about instructing those who do not know what a surplus is? The surplus is that which remains of the income after the expenditure of the year has been met. If there had not been these annuities other funds must have been found; fresh taxation must have been imposed. That the Chancellor of the Exchequer should hold such language about surpluses really passes my understanding.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I have always held that language.

MR. GOSCHEN: Well, it passes my understanding. If the right hon. Gentleman acknowledges that he holds such language, he shows that he does not know what a surplus is in the ordinary sense. He says that we created fictitious surpluses by borrowing. He himself is borrowing now for telegraphs and for other purposes. It is absolutely foolish for him to hold such language. If he is right the County Council always has a deficit, because it is always borrowing for some purpose or other. What the right hon. Gentleman says is really not business. Well, my noble Friend has raised this point. The Chancellor of the Exchequer prefers to continue in what he conceives to be the regular course of coolly appropriating a sum of money which belongs not to this year but to last year, and which at this moment ought to have been applied to the liquidation of debts. And he thinks he has set an example of sound finance to his heterodox predecessor. I should certainly recommend my noble Friend to proceed to a Division.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he rose to support the Amendment of his noble Friend, and he would crave the attention of the Committee for a few moments, because at the behest of the House he had to perform duties which brought him into very close relation with such transactions as that now before the Committee. He might offer a very strong defence of the Naval Defence Act, as he had often done to his constituents, but he would not attempt anything of the kind in the presence of the distinguished and honoured statesmen who were at that moment sitting below him. He quite admitted that if the Amendment were carried, the result would be to leave the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a very modest surplus. He firmly believed that the object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in adopting the course he had done with reference to the money dealt with in the Amendment was to produce a surplus. The question was whether the particular method of procedure adopted was justifiable. In his (Sir R. Temple's) humble opinion, it was not. The Amendment related to a small sum of £288,000, which in his further observations he would for the sake of clearness symbolise by referring to it as a quarter of a million. Under the Naval Defence Act a sum of £10,000,000 was authorised to be expended on shipbuilding. The expenditure was to run over a period of seven years, and there were to be annual instalments of about £1,400,000 for seven years, but power was given by the Act to expedite the shipbuilding by borrowing sums of money within £10,000,000. It had so happened that for naval reasons the whole of the £10,000,000 had been expended within five years. During those five years £7,000,000 had been paid by the Treasury, and about £3,300,000 had been borrowed. The consequence was that the amount received was about £10,250,000, instead of £10,000,000. If the Naval Defence Fund were wound up, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to wind it up, there was no doubt a sum of £250,000 of unexpended balance, technically speaking. The question was how the £250,000 should be applied. He said most confidently—and he would if necessary say so before a jury of Auditors General—that it must be applied to reduction of debt. Reduction of what debt? Why, of course, of the debt of £3,000,000 odd. Of course, the House of Commons might in its omnipotence otherwise order. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed by Sub-section 2 of this clause that the money should be paid into the Exchequer. This was a proposal which he (Sir R. Temple) submitted was wrong financially. He should have thought that the best way of winding up the fund would have been to pay off the £3,000,000 by continuing the instalments authorised by the Act. By Sub-section 3 of the clause the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to apply the Old and New Sinking Funds to the repayment of the £3,000,000. If this were done it ought to be done with the aid of the £250,000—that was to say, that the Sinking Funds should be applied to the repayment of the amount less the £250,000. Instead of paying the whole of the £3,000,000 from the Sinking Funds, only £2,750,000 should be obtained from that source, and the remaining £250,000 should be obtained from the source he had mentioned. As it was, the £250,000 was left in the air, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer laid his hands upon it and helped himself to it. The right hon. Gentleman had no right to do this. The money did not belong to him, and he (Sir R. Temple), with all respect, distinctly charged the right hon. Gentleman with taking money for the revenue side of his Budget to which he was not entitled, and to which he had no right whatever to help himself. By adopting this plan the right hon. Gentleman had really added to the debt. He had taken £250,000 more from the Sinking Fund than he ought to have taken, and to that extent he had added to the debt.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I feel bound to take the sense of the Committee on this question. I am absolutely certain that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would never have had recourse to this plan had it not been for the financial exigencies of the position. I submit that the Treasury are setting a dangerous precedent by dispensing with the law because the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being happens to be hard up.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 100 ; Noes 54.—(Division List, No. 189.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 38 agreed to.

MR. R. T. REID moved, in page 2, after Clause 2, to insert the following new clause :—

(Exception for transactions for money consideration.)

“(1) Estate Duty shall not be payable in respect of property passing on the death of the deceased by reason only of a bond fide purchase from the person under whose disposition the property passes, nor in respect of the falling into possession of the reversion on any lease for lives, nor in respect of the determination of any annuity for lives, where such purchase was made, or such lease or annuity granted, for full consideration in money or money's worth paid to the vendor or grantor for his own use or benefit.

(2) Where any such purchase was made, or lease or annuity granted, for partial consideration in money or money's worth paid to the vendor or grantor for his own use or benefit, the value of the consideration shall be allowed as a deduction from the value of the property for the purpose of Estate Duty.”

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. R. T. REID moved, in page 8, after Clause 9, to insert the following Clause :—

(Appeal from Commissioners.)

“(1) Any person aggrieved by the amount of duty claimed by the Commissioners, whether on the ground of the value of any property or the rate charged or otherwise, may, on payment of the duty claimed by the Commissioners, or such portion of it as is then payable by him, appeal to the High Court within the time and in the manner and on the conditions directed by Rules of Court, and the amount of duty shall be determined by the High Court, and if the duty as determined is less than that paid to the Commissioners the excess shall be repaid.

(2) The costs of the appeal shall be in the discretion of the Court, and the Court, where it appears to the Court just, may order the Commissioners to pay on any excess of duty repaid by them interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum for such period as appears to the Court just.

(3) Provided that the High Court, if satisfied that it would be unjust to require the appellant to pay the whole of the duty claimed as a condition of an appeal, may allow an appeal to be brought on payment of such portion of that duty as to the Court seems reasonable; but in such case interest at the rate of 3 per cent. shall be payable on the unpaid duty so far as it becomes payable under the decision of the Court.

(4) Where the value as alleged by the Commissioners of the property in respect of which the dispute arises does not exceed £10,000, the appeal under this section may be to the County Court for the county or place in which the appellant resides or the property is situate, and this section shall for the purpose of the appeal apply as if such County Court were the High Court.”

New Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

MR. DODD asked if it was intended that there should be an appeal from the High Court in the one case and from the County Court in the other, or were the decisions of these Courts to be final? The clause was not clear on the point.

SIR J. RIGBY said, the point would be considered and made clear if there was any doubt about it.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be added to the Bill.”

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he would move, on behalf of Sir R. WEBSTER, to insert, after “payments of,” the words “or giving security for.” He thought that this was a most reasonable proposal, and he hoped the Government would accept it. It would be a considerable relief to the taxpayers, and there could be no fairness in requiring the person accountable to pay the duty before the right of appeal could be exercised.

Amendment proposed to the proposed New Clause, in line 3, after the words “payment of,” to insert the words “or giving security for.”—(Sir M. Hicks-Beach.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR J. RIGBY was understood to oppose the Amendment on the ground that it would cause inconvenience to the Treasury.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) thought the learned Attorney General did not follow the object of the Amendment; the hardship that it was intended to meet was in the case where a duty had been demanded in excess of what was justly due.

SIR J. RIGBY said, it was perfectly obvious what was the meaning of the Amendment, and it was one that must cause considerable inconvenience to the Department.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, the argument of the learned Attorney General was that the Commissioners did not like it, that it would mean delay, and therefore the Government would not have it. That was not a fair way to treat a proposal asking for the relief of the taxpayer. He could not see why it should not be allowed to rest with the Court to say whether security should be given instead of the duty having to be paid, and that was all that was asked by the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

MR. BYRNE (Essex, Walthamstow) protested against the notion that it was to be a condition that a man was to pay the full amount of the duty before he was entitled to appeal. The further concession they asked was small, that a man should be able to give security for the payment instead of paying the money down. In no other form of litigation was anything of the kind demanded as was demanded under this clause, and therefore it appeared to him that they were departing from the ordinary principles of justice. The Amendment was in order to meet those cases where a man knew the demand made against him was unfair and unjust, and therefore they were only asking for justice when they asked that a man should be entitled to give security for costs rather than have to sell part of the property in order to pay the duty, a part of which might have to be afterwards refunded. He could not understand how too much work would be thrown upon the administrative department by giving security which might be security "to the satisfaction of the Court," when the matter would be decided as other questions of finding security were decided, in Chambers, so that no burden would be thrown upon the administrative department. But there was something beyond. They were now re-organising a body that were to have large powers. They had had large powers which they had exercised fairly on the whole, but now they were going to raise a number of new cases in which difficult questions as to valuation and otherwise would arise; they were going to increase the charges very much in proportion to the property taken, and were they going to force a man to sell property which otherwise he need not sell, in order that he should pay a certain amount of duty before they had ascertained it was a fair and just amount he should be called upon to pay? It appeared to him that was contrary to one's ordinary notions of justice. The concession they asked was a small one, and was not that they should be put upon even the ordinary footing of other litigants.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the argument, and the solitary argument the Government had vouchsafed to give them on this occasion was that it would be inconvenient to the Department concerned, and therefore the Amendment should not be introduced into this clause. Whenever they had an absolutely unanswerable case on the grounds of equity, the convenience of the Department was invariably thrown in their teeth. They were told that however strong their arguments might be, however just the cause was bound to be, if the gentlemen at Somerset House would be put to inconvenience, that was sufficient reason for rejecting their claims. He admitted, of course, the administrative arguments, as far as they went, were valid arguments. There was a Debate earlier in the evening in which it was stated, on the strength of the authorities of the Inland Revenue Department, that if their suggestions in regard to the Income Tax under Schedule (A) were carried out, the whole collecting machinery would be broken up, and that a great financial injury would be inflicted upon the community at large, and many of his hon. Friends were so impressed by the value of that administrative argument that they were not prepared to go into the Division Lobby and vote for the Amendment, which, upon its merits, was unanswerable. He quoted that to show they were prepared, when the case was a strong one, to allow administrative argument to override the broad principle of equity. But could it be maintained in this case there was any evidence of administrative inconvenience? Under what circumstances were the Inland Revenue to be asked to make arrangements with regard to security? Only if there was a dispute about the amount of the duty, and they were told in the earlier stages that in all the years during which the Inland Revenue administered the Death Duties not one single case had got into Court. [Sir J. RIGBY: No.] Each of the learned Gentlemen quoted it once, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was not here to contradict him, quoted it a great many times at all events, and they were told on various occasions, but always with conviction, that so admirably did the Inland Revenue manage its affairs that it never came into collision with its unfortunate debtors; so gently did it perform its work, the process was so painless, that the patient never even felt the shock, and certainly never made any complaint. If that was so, and the Inland Revenue were going to continue in the future these admirable traditions, how was it to throw an extraordinary burden upon them? If the virtues of the Inland Revenue were so great an appeal would never come into question at all, it was a mere security that would never be called upon. But there was another point. As his learned Friend behind him had said, they were asking very little, and that they might with justice ask for a great deal more. They asked that the amount should not be exacted, but that security for the money should be exacted; though he could not see why even security for the money should be exacted; as he could not see why the ordinary relations between debtor and creditor should be reversed in this particular case. If he claimed that a man owed him money, had he a right to make him pay the money or give security before he went into Court? The word "debtor" was used constantly by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech on the Second Reading; he said, "this is a debt owed to the State." If so, let the State behave as every other creditor was compelled to behave and prove the legality of the debt before it exacted the amount. He thought the Amendment did not go the full length which justice required, but it did contain a very fair compromise, and a compromise they were ready to be content with, and he therefore asked the Government, in obedience to common sense and equity, to make the small concession they demanded, and to turn a deaf ear to the plea of administrative convenience, a plea that had been ridden to death on more than one occasion in these Debates.

MR. R. T. REID said, it might be assumed the Government would not object to this Amendment unless there were real grounds for objecting. The clause was put down to give the right of appeal to persons aggrieved, but what they said was that if they appealed they must first pay the duty, and if the Court was satisfied the duty paid was more than ought to have been paid, the excess should be repaid. The right hon. Gentleman said it was a small matter. So it was in amount, but it was not a small matter in substance, and if people were allowed to appeal without payment of the money, he was afraid it would be a temptation to a good many persons to appeal, and the result would be a good deal of delay and inconvenience.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he would make a suggestion that they should leave the Court a free hand, and they could do that by introducing the words "or giving security to the satisfaction of the Court for." He thought there could be no reasonable ground for objecting to the Amendment in that form, and it would meet all the objections raised by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. R. T. REID: I will accept that.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, after the words "payment of," in line 3, to insert the words "or giving security to the satisfaction of the Court for."—(Sir M. Hicks-Beach.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*LORD BURGHLEY (Northampton, N.) was understood to agree with the suggestion made, but considered that there was little difference between depositing the money or the security, and that it was hardly fair for the authorities at Somerset House to be protected in this way.

Question put, and agreed to.

*MAJOR DARWIN (Staffordshire, Lichfield) moved to amend the clause by the insertion of words providing that a beneficiary who doubted the valuation of the estate as declared by the Commissioners should have the right to appeal "within two years after the death of the deceased, or within such further time as the Court may allow."

Under the clause as it stood in the Bill it entirely depended on the Court within what time the appeal could be made. The Court might if they liked, enact that no appeal should be made except within six months after the death of the deceased. Indeed, he thought it probable that the Court would limit the appeal to a very short period after the first instalment of the duty had been paid, and that might cause in many cases a very serious hardship and grave injustice might be the consequence. He thought, therefore, some definite time should be fixed within which the beneficiary could appeal. He suggested two years as the period, because that was the time in which the Commissioners might refuse to give the beneficiary a certificate of discharge, and he thought that so long as the Commissioners might refuse to give the beneficiary a certificate of discharge, the beneficiary should have within that period the right to appeal to the Court. There was another reason in support of the Amendment. If the beneficiary was doubtful as to the value placed on the estate by the Commissioners he would be very much tempted to test that valuation by the sale of the estate. But the clause as it stood would impel the beneficiary to hurry on with the sale; and what was asked in the Amendment was that the beneficiary should have time to have the arrangements for the sale completed in order that he might have the value of the estate as determined by the sale, to bring as evidence before the Court on appeal. The beneficiary would require some time before he could come to a decision as to the course he would follow. He could not at first tell whether he would be able to reside on the estate and meet the duty by instalments. If they gave the beneficiary plenty of time, it is possible he would find that he could live on the estate, and would not need to sell it. No one desired to see the landlords changed. Some hon. Members might wish to abolish landlordism, but he thought they were all agreed that it would be an evil to bring about a change in the landlords; and for that reason also his Amendment ought to be supported.

Amendment proposed in line 5, to leave out the second word "the," and insert the words "two years of the death of the deceased or within such further."
—(Major Darwin.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'the' stand part of the Clause."

MR. R. T. REID said, the Government had left this subject to be dealt with within the time, in the manner, and under the conditions directed by the Rules of Court, which might on occasion be varied. He thought that this was a fair solution of the question, as the Rules might be altered from time to time, if desirable. He asked was it advisable in the interests of the Revenue that there should be a minimum period of two years fixed within which a beneficiary might appeal in a matter in which promptness and despatch were so essential? He thought they ought not to be too suspicious of the Courts to whom they left the power to regulate this matter.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES pointed out that a sale of the property within two years, and the valuation resulting therefrom, would be outside the scope of the Bill, because the value of the property as settled by the Bill was the value at the moment of death of the deceased, and not its value at any other time. The value according to the Bill would not be the value ascertained in an ordinary sale in any ordinary open market. That value would be the value of the estate if it were sold by a forced sale at the moment of the death of the deceased. But there was another objection, and he thought an almost fatal objection, to the Amendment. He really believed that he was the only Member in the House who remembered all the clauses of the Bill. The Committee would find that Clause 7, Sub-section 9, dealt with the case of excessive charge of duty due to over-valuation, and provided for an appeal to the Court, within the time, in the manner, and under the conditions prescribed by the Rules of Court. It would, consequently, be inconsistent with that clause, if the Committee were now to make a different prescription, binding the Court not to make any Rule which would prevent the beneficiary from appealing at any time within two years. He, therefore, hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn.

MR. BYRNE said, he was inclined to agree with his hon. Friend the Member for King's Lynn. He thought the time within which an appeal should be allowed might very well be left to the Court to determine. But there was another point to which he desired to draw attention. They had been told more than once by the Law Officers that if a man choosed he might elect not to pay the duty, and that in that case proceedings would have to be taken against him so that in that way he could have the question of valuation settled without having recourse to the Bill at all. He wished to ask whether, in dealing with this matter of appeals, the Attorney General could not allow the usual and less cumbersome form of practice prevailing in regard to other matters to be adopted in the cases under discussion.

SIR J. RIGBY said, that he did not admit that an appeal was given in every case. The subject raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite was very wide indeed, and could not be dealt with at this last stage of the discussion in Committee. It was a matter that would keep them in Committee a very long time indeed.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) inquired whether any provision existed which would cause the Rules that the Court might make to be laid before the House? If such a provision existed, then he was in favour of leaving the matter in the hands of the High Court; but if any Rules which the Court might make would not be brought before the House, there was, he thought, much more force in the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

*MAJOR DARWIN pointed out that his Amendment would not limit the time in which these appeals would be made; but if the House would have the opportunity of revising the Rules drawn up by the Court that would serve his purpose quite as well. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Lynn Regis that the value of the estate a year afterwards was no evidence of its value at the time of the death. He thought the value of the estate a year after the death was very good evidence of its value at the time of the death.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, he did not think the difficulty would be settled by the Rules of the Court being laid on the Table of the House. Everyone who had any experience of the mode of dealing with Orders of the kind after 12 o'clock at night knew that it was a most unsatisfactory mode of regulating the matter. He believed that if the records of the House were searched it would be found that the House had been unable to effect any control in matters of the kind. From his experience in business, he was of opinion that it was most desirable that adequate time should be given for appeal; and he thought a period of two years was a fair minimum.

MR. BUTCHER said, that the question really was whether the Committee should fix the minimum time or whether the Court should be left to do so. He thought it was a matter for the Committee to deal with, and he thought that the Committee ought to deal with it. His hon. Friend who moved the Amendment had truly pointed out that a man who came in for a property would take some time before he could value its outgoings and value its incomings; and that, therefore, he should have a reasonable period within which to discover for himself whether the Commissioners had fixed the proper value on the estate. His hon. Friend the Member for Lynn Regis had said the value under the Bill was the value at the time of the death. But, prima facie, the value of the property a year or so after the death was, he thought, very good evidence of its value at the time of the death. He thought they should not leave it to the Rules of Court, which might or might not be altered by the House, to determine the time within which an appeal should be allowed. He thought the Committee should do it themselves, and should fix two years, which was not at all an unreasonable period from the point of view of either the Revenue or the parties interested.

SIR J. RIGBY was understood to say that such a thing as this had never been suggested. Whenever it came to a matter of procedure it was acknowledged that a Committee of the House of Commons was not a fit tribunal to deal with the matter, and that there could not be a better tribunal than the Council of Judges, to whom practically all questions of practice had been relegated for some years.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he was sorry he could not altogether agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman. He had always found that when questions like that now under discussion arose the Government of the day were anxious that they should be settled by Rules of Court, while the Opposition were anxious that they should be settled by the House of Commons. It had always been recognised as a fair compromise between the two opinions that questions which did not affect matters of principle should be settled by Rules of Court, and that such Rules when made should be laid before the House of Commons for its information. He was, therefore, sorry to hear words from the Attorney General deprecating such a course being taken. Even when Rules were laid upon the Table of the House it was not an easy matter to call attention to what was objectionable in them or obtain their reversal, but the publicity obtained was a salutary check, and, therefore, he hoped that the Government would reconsider their determination upon the point.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that a recent decision of the House of Lords under the Patent Act in regard to Board of Trade Rules showed the advantage of Rules of this kind being laid before the House. The Courts in Scotland challenged the Rules, declaring that they were ultra vires. The House of Lords reversed that decision, and the Lord Chancellor, in giving judgment, drew attention to the fact that the Rules had to be laid for 40 days before the House of Commons before they came into force, and said that no Rules could be ultra vires which had to pass through that ordeal. The Solicitor General not long ago had succeeded in stopping Rules that the Judges had made from coming into operation. ["No, no!"] Yes; he referred to Rules which the Judges had made, and which were withdrawn on notice being given that objection was taken in the House. As to dealing with these matters being limited by the forms of the House, he would point out that they could be taken after 12 o'clock at night. He joined his right hon. Friend in hoping that at the end of the Bill a clause might be inserted, declaring that the Rules must be laid upon the Table of the House, and could not be enforced until that had been done.

SIR J. RIGBY, whose utterance was almost inaudible in the Gallery, was believed to refer to the difference existing between Rules requiring the confirmation of the House and those merely laid upon the Table for the information of Members.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.) thought the Amendment was one of substance, and not merely of procedure or practice. If carried it would not interfere with the framing of Rules of Court, or with the choice of the persons who were to frame those Rules. It would be merely an indication that the House thought that anybody who felt he had a grievance should have at least two years in which to bring an appeal.

MR. BRYCE said, that if Rules were not to be 40 days before the House of Commons before taking effect there should be some limit of time within which an appeal must be made. He had thought that these Rules of Court would be the same as those made under the Judicature Act. If that were the case he should not feel inclined to support his hon. Friend in the Division Lobby, but if, on the other hand, they were to be Rules of Court made without that sanction which they would get by being laid on the Table of the House he should support him.

*MAJOR DARWIN said, that if he were given to understand that these would be effective Rules of Court he would withdraw the Amendment.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, there was a distinction between Rules of Court which did not obtain validity before they had been before the House 40 days and Rules of Court which were merely laid on the Table. Rules being laid before the House for 40 days implied and gave the right to any Member to call attention to the Rules and to move their rejection at any time after 12 o'clock at night.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, Her Majesty's Government were placing them in an invidious position. He was much disposed to agree with the objection raised that two years was too long a time to give for appealing, and that the elasticity which would be secured by Rules of Court might be desirable. At the same time, they on that side of the House, in accordance with what had fallen from the Mover of the Amendment, felt strongly that the public had a right to know what the Rules were before they came into force, and that, therefore, they ought to be laid upon the Table of the House. He had never heard of such a request being refused by any Government.

SIR J. RIGBY said, he was willing to take the matter into consideration before the Report stage was reached. He had no authority to give any further pledge.

MR. TOMLINSON said, it was an extraordinary thing that no Minister who had authority to give a pledge on behalf of Her Majesty's Government was present.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that the matter would be considered before the Report. In certain cases it was directed that the Rules should be laid upon the Table for the information of the House, and over such Rules the House had no jurisdiction whatever. There was another class of Rules in which it was directed by Statute that they should not come into force until they had lain upon the Table of the House for 40 days, and in such instances the Rules could be challenged. He saw no reason why Rules under this Bill should be treated differently to Rules framed under the Judicature Act.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, his contention was that an hon. Member had a right to object to a Rule laid upon the Table of the House, even though there were no statute declaring that it should not be valid until it had lain before Parliament for 40 days. In the case of the Rules of the Road at Sea, which were merely directed to be laid upon the Table, they had been successfully challenged.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he had not stated that there was no power to call attention to such Rules; but there were a certain class of Rules which had no force whatever until they had lain on the Table for 40 days. Either House of Parliament might petition against them. The other class of Rules were laid upon the Table for the information of the House.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: And you can move an Address on them. You can move an Address on any subject you like in this House.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that as the right hon. Gentleman's statement might be quoted hereafter as one having authority, he wished to say that, having had occasion to consult Mr. Speaker on this matter at the beginning of the Session, he was informed, upon the precedents, that whenever time was limited, it implied and carried with it the power of moving an Address. This applied even to Papers laid on the Table for information only.

MAJOR DARWIN said he begged to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH begged to move the insertion of a new subsection with regard to the procedure in an appeal from the Commissioners to the High Court, and in certain cases to the County Court. They had incorporated in the Bill certain provisions as to the mode in which the principal value of property was to be ascertained by the Commissioners. The value was to be the market value at the time of death, and a special provision with regard to agricultural property limited the market value to 25 years' purchase of the net annual value, calculated in a certain way. That, of course, was a great improvement on the Bill as it originally stood. Still, great opportunity for disputes between the Commissioners and the persons accountable for duty was left open. It was obvious that in cases where the property did not come within the limiting proviso of 25 years' purchase of the net annual value, or where, on the other hand, its market value—being bad agricultural land—was below that 25 years' purchase, disputes might arise between the Commissioners and the persons accountable. He was acquainted with a case in which a leasehold house in London was valued by the Commissioners for purposes of probate at £5,000. The legatee demurred to that value and put it at something like £1,500 less, but the Commissioners insisted on payment of Probate Duty on £5,000. Within a year the property was sold by the legatee for £3,500, and on application the excess duty was returned. He quoted that case as showing the great difference there might be between the valuation of the Commissioners and that of the persons accountable for duty in estimating the market value of property of that class. Therefore, this Bill very properly provided an appeal to the High Court and the County Court. But how were these Courts to arrive at a decision as to market value? He thought the Committee on reflection would admit that the Judge of the High Court could not possibly decide such questions himself, nor could the Judge of the County Court. They would, therefore, be compelled to one of two courses. They must either hear evidence brought before them by the Commissioners and persons accountable as to the market value of the property, or they must refer the matter out of Court to some expert who was qualified to decide the subject. If they adopted the first course, enormous expense would be involved and great hardships would consequently accrue to the persons accountable. Furthermore, it would by such a mode be very difficult indeed to arrive at the real market value of the property; the valuers on the one side and the other would be likely to differ to a most extraordinary extent. He had knowledge of a case in which some property had to be valued on behalf of a seller and purchaser in a large town in the Midlands. Five experts were called in by the seller and five on the other side. The five on the part of the seller valued the property at from £61,000 to £52,000, and the five on the part of the purchaser valued it at from £21,000 to £17,000. There could not be a better example of the impossibility of arriving at a fair decision through the evidence of experts. A Judge who had to decide the value of property would be well advised if he referred the matter to arbitration. He had prepared an Amendment to the new clause of the Solicitor General which would cover these points. There should be first some Local Authority, so to speak, standing between the taxpayer and the Inland Revenue Commissioners in this matter, much as the local Commissioners of Income Tax now stood between the taxpayer and the Inland Revenue Commissioners. He proposed that a list of qualified valuers should be formed for each county by the County Councils and County Borough Councils in Great Britain, and by some similar Local Body in Ireland, and that these authorities should lay down the scale of remuneration to be charged. From a rota of these valuers, comprising as it would amongst its members those who knew most about the value of local property—who certainly would know more about it than valuers sent down from London—the Judge of the High Court or the Judge of the County Court would select some one valuer to arbitrate between the Commissioners and the persons accountable. He did not propose that this should be compulsory on the Court. It would have the option in each case either of deciding itself or of appointing an arbitrator. He had made inquiries as to what the probable procedure would be, and he was informed that cases of this kind would, under the ordinary Rules, be referred to some sort of arbitration. He was confident that it would not only be the best and fairest, but very much the cheapest, mode of arriving at a fair judgment of what the value of property was, and therefore what the duty ought to be. He was sanguine that the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite would be able to assent to the proposal, therefore he would not trouble the Committee at greater length. He ventured to suggest this scheme to the Committee, and if the words of his sub-section were not exactly to the taste of the Government they could be easily amended on Report.

Amendment proposed, in line 8, at end, insert—

“The County Council of every county and county borough in Great Britain, and the Grand Jury of every county in Ireland, shall within 12 months after the commencement of this Act, and may thereafter from time to time, appoint a sufficient number of qualified persons to act as valuers for the purposes of this Act in their respective counties, and shall fix a scale of charges for the remuneration of such persons, and the Court may refer any question of disputed value under this section to the arbitration of any person so appointed for the county in which the appellant resides or the property is situate; and the costs of any such arbitration shall be part of the costs of the appeal.”—(Sir M. Hicks-Beach.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. SEXTON said, this might be suitable enough as far as Great Britain was concerned. No doubt it would be well to cast on the County Councils—who were elective bodies—the function of appointing valuers to determine the value of estates.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: The High Court would select the valuers from the rota. If the hon. Member can suggest any better authority than the Grand Jury in Ireland, I shall be happy to adopt it.

MR. SEXTON said, he did not think the people of Ireland would be satisfied to entrust such a duty to the Grand Jury, who were a nominated and not an elective body, and he would ask the right hon. Baronet, or he would himself, if necessary, move to leave out the words “and the Grand Jury of every county in Ireland.” Words must be added, if necessary, at the end of the paragraph to empower the High Court itself to appoint valuers.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, he had no objection at all to the proposal of the hon. Member for Kerry.

MR. R. T. REID said, he agreed to this Amendment, and he understood the right hon. Baronet was willing to accept the appointment of these valuers by the High Court in Ireland instead of by the Grand Jury. He would refrain from making any comment on the Grand Juries of Ireland. That point being agreed between the right hon. Baronet and the hon. Gentleman he saw no objection in principle to the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet. There might be questions about the way the clause was framed, but that was a question of detail, not machinery, and he was quite prepared to accept it. He would, therefore, move to omit the words "Grand Jury in every county in Ireland," in order to insert the words "High Court in Ireland."

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH offered no opposition to this Amendment, though he thought that the principle of appointing local valuers should apply in Ireland as in Great Britain.

MR. SEXTON said, the High Court might be trusted to appoint a sufficient number of valuers, and he thought that for the whole of Ireland a staff would not be required on the same scale as in Great Britain.

MR. R. T. REID said, he would suggest for the present the words "Grand Jury for every county in Ireland" be omitted, the purpose being to complete it on Report by the insertion of other words.

Amendment proposed to proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "Grand Jury for every county in Ireland."

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. BUTCHER (York) proposed, in line 15 of the Solicitor General's Amendment, to insert the words "without requiring payment of any portion of the duty or." The change which this Amendment would make was this. By the Government proposal the plan was to set aside the claim made by the Commissioners, and if the Court thought it unjust that the appellant should pay the whole duty, the Court should allow payment of a portion of the duty. He proposed that if the Court thought it unjust that the whole duty should be paid the matter should be brought to Court without payment of duty at all, the distinction being that the Government insisted that some duty should be paid, and he suggested that in some cases, if the Court thought it proper, no payment should be made. Supposing the Commissioners said an estate was worth a considerable sum of money and the executor thought it was worth nothing at all, why should the executor be obliged to pay any duty? If he was right, no duty would be payable. Why should he, in order to take the opinion of the Court, pay a sum of money down? Take another case in which the Commissioners made a very large claim for duty, while the executor thought a very much smaller amount was payable. It might be the case that the executor had absolutely nothing to pay the duty with. Was it right or reasonable that before he could get hold of any of the estate at all, before he had a penny in his hands out of which to pay the duty, that in order to obtain the decision of the Court he should have to pay a sum of money down? He protested against the view that the Government or the Commissioners were to be placed in an entirely different position from any litigant in the country. If the Court thought it fair that the litigant should not pay the sum why should the Government insist upon its payment? As a matter of principle, he asked the Committee to say that in such cases they should be allowed to litigate with the Government on fair terms.

Amendment proposed, in line 15, after the word "brought," to insert the words "without requiring payment of any portion of the duty or."—(Mr. Butcher.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the Government had gone as far as they ought to do. They had already made a concession on the subject of security.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, he thought it was only justice that a man should have the option of giving security instead of finding the money. It was perfectly well known to all who had dealings in these cases that giving security meant paying for the security, or, in other words, it was a charge put upon the person who found the security. He understood the Solicitor General to say it would be right to give the Court a discretion in the matter. If he could trust the Courts, which of course he could, surely he should leave it to them to decide whether it was a case in which the appeal ought to be allowed without any money being paid or any security being given, and he suggested with great respect to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the answer he had given had not met his hon. and learned Friend's point. There might be cases in which, as a matter of common justice, they did not think any security ought to be given or any money to be paid, and to tell the Court to say there must be something to pay, put the Court into an invidious and absurd position.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said, the Solicitor General had allowed a diminution in the full payment before the appeal was tried, and it was only a logical extension of that principle that in cases where the Court thought it just there should be no payment at all, and he should have thought the Government would at once accept it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the Amendment which the Government had already accepted would meet the case. That was not so. If he had been in the House when his hon. Friend on the Front Bench spoke, he would have heard him say there would be considerable difficulty in certain cases where the claim was unjust. He really thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer was resisting a matter so obvious that it was hardly worth his while.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, practically the only difference between them was a question of one farthing, for the Court, as he understood it, might direct that only a farthing should be paid, as there was no inferior limit to the amount they might order to be paid. As it was such a small matter he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer might give way.

MR. BYRNE said, if he thought the Member for Lynn Regis were right as to what the Court thought it could do, he should take a very different view from what he did. But he thought that in a case of this description the Court would think it its duty to require some considerable amount of security. The cases in which the Court thought it unjust must be extremely few, but in those few cases it seemed very hard that a person might not litigate without payment.

Sir R. Webster

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, it was always an ungracious task to look a gift horse in the mouth, and he did not forget that the Amendment which was under consideration was one which the Government introduced in their Bill in order to meet arguments and opinions advanced from that side of the House, and nothing he could say would be calculated unduly to press the Government. At the same time, after listening to the arguments of his hon. and learned Friend behind him, and to the answer given from the Treasury Bench, it seemed to him this was a substantial point, which if granted would not in any sense injure the Inland Revenue, whose interests the Government were bound to protect. His hon. Friend the Member for Lynn Regis believed the Court might require the payment of one farthing. He supposed if the language of the clause was literally interpreted that was possible, but he was told the Courts would not venture so to interpret the directions of Parliament in this matter, and that they would always consider under this clause some substantial contribution should be paid by the litigant. He thought it was impossible to justify a provision of that kind. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not attempted to justify it. He had told them in courteous language that he thought the Government had gone far enough in modifying existing laws to the extent of allowing the Court any discretion in the matter. There might be cases, no doubt, as he had reminded them, under the present system, in which a man had to pay the whole of the disputed duty before he was entitled to appeal. That argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, no doubt, sound. It was perfectly true that the existing system was harsh, illogical, and unjustifiable, and that the Government had made very important modifications in that system in the direction of justice. But he thought that when his learned Friend behind him had pointed out that the cases in which this would come into operation were very few, and these cases must, in the opinion of the Court, be cases in which a great wrong was being inflicted, he thought the Government must see there was really something to be said in favour of the Amendment. He could hardly, for his own part, imagine cases under which the Court would grant this, but there might be cases in which there would be no duty to be paid at all, because the market value of the property at the time of the death of the deceased was nil, and the Inland Revenue might hold that a considerable duty ought to be paid upon it. If the executor was right then it was quite clear that not one sixpence could be raised upon the property for the purpose of paying the duty. Surely, rare though such cases might be, they ought not to leave them out of their view. They ought to make some provision for dealing with them, and a provision more just in itself, more in accordance with ordinary principles of legislation, and safer for the Inland Revenue than that which his hon. and learned Friend had proposed he found it difficult to conceive, and under those circumstances, though he did not wish unduly to press the Government, he should think it would be worth their while giving the very small concession in regard to the number of cases included, but a considerable concession as regarded the justice and equity of this Bill which was demanded by his hon. and learned Friend. He did not know whether his hon. Friend would consider it worth while to go to a Division if the Government should remain obstinately fixed in their present view of the situation; but if he went to a Division he should support him.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he did not wish to be unreasonable, and he did not think he had shown himself to be so. Certainly upon this point of security he was influenced by the arguments used by the Leader of the Opposition of a person called upon to pay money on a fixture which he was not really bound to pay for. He was struck very much at the time, and determined to yield. But he had consulted the authorities of the Inland Revenue, and they did not advise going any further, and he was afraid he was bound not to yield.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 71 ; Noes 115.—(Division List, No. 140.)

On Motion of Sir M. HICKS-BEACH, the following Amendment to the new Clause was agreed to :—Line 17, after "case," insert "the Court may order."

MR. R. T. REID moved, in page 8, after Clause 10, to insert the following Clause :—

(Commutation of duty on interest in expectancy).

"The Commissioners in their discretion, upon application by a person entitled to an interest in expectancy, may commute the Estate Duty which would, but for the commutation, be payable in respect of such interest for a certain sum to be presently paid, and for determining that sum shall cause a present value to be set upon such duty, regard being had to the contingencies affecting the liability to and rate and amount of such duty; and interest being reckoned at 3 per cent., and on the receipt of such sum they shall give a certificate of discharge accordingly."

He said the clause carried out the understanding that had been come to; and the Amendments which had been put on the Paper by the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight went beyond it. They could not commute a mere speculation as to which it was uncertain whether or not Estate Duty would be payable upon it.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that the discretion of the Commissioners would be limited to the cases in which they could calculate exactly what might be payable if the clause stood as framed. He would suggest that the word "might" should be substituted for "would" before the words "but for the commutation," and "become" substituted for "be" immediately after those words, so as not to fetter the discretion of the Commissioners and give to the Amendment the scope which was intended.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time.

Amendment proposed, after "would," insert "or might."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BYRNE said, the clause was an empowering one merely. There was nothing to compel the Commissioners to act on it at all. He agreed that if they were going to compel the Commissioners to commute in cases where there was merely a contingency to provide for, it might be imposing on them a duty which it might be said ought not to be imposed on them; but, so long as the clause was permissible, he did not see why the Commissioners should not — if they considered it right and desirable—commute the duty in cases of contingency. It was in cases of contingency that the clause, if acted on, would be most valuable. So long as there was no contingency, there would be comparatively little difficulty in ascertaining what would be the precise amount ultimately payable on the settlement, but in a case, say, where a man was entitled to property for life and where the property then went to the son, in the event of his attaining 21 years of age, if the son made an arrangement with an Insurance Society, why should he not be able to go to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue and say, "I will pay a certain sum down now"? This would be to the advantage of the Inland Revenue. At any rate, it was just as likely that they would fail to receive the money in the event of the contingency happening as it was that they would get the full duty in the event of the contingency falling out in the right direction.

SIR J. RIGBY said, the clause had been introduced in fulfilment of a promise which had been made. The words it was proposed to insert were utterly unnecessary, but as they were harmless they had better be accepted.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that under the Succession Duty Act the duty varied according to the consanguinity of the successor to the predecessor. That was ascertainable at the time of the composition and did not alter, whereas under the Bill the duty would vary with aggregation and the amount of the property. Therefore, when the Attorney General took clauses out of the Succession Duty Act dealing with a fixed duty and put them in a Bill in which the duty was not fixed he showed that he misapprehended the case.

Question put, and agreed to.

Other Amendments to the proposed new Clause agreed to.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that inasmuch as commutation meant that a smaller sum would be taken if paid down than would accrue at the end of a number of years, words should be put in to show that a discharge should be given to the person liable to commutation. He, therefore, moved the Amendment standing in his name.

Mr. Byrne

Amendment proposed, in line 8, at the end of the clause, to add the words

"which shall discharge such interest when it falls into possession from any further claim for Estate Duty.—(Sir R. Webster.)"

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR J. RIGBY said, the fact of commutation would be a discharge from liability in connection with that one transaction. If the Amendment meant anything it meant that, although there might be another death upon which Estate Duty was properly payable, that duty should not be paid. That was directly contrary to the meaning and spirit of the Bill. He was bound to oppose the Amendment.

SIR R. WEBSTER said, that interests might fall in during or after the commutation, and his contention was that the Commissioners in commuting should bear those interests in mind.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK said, he thought the Amendment necessary, as without it the purchaser of a reversion could not tell what he was buying, and the clause would therefore not fulfil its object.

SIR J. RIGBY said, there could be no doubt that the man who commuted would be free on paying the duty, but the words of the Amendment would extend to persons who had had nothing to do with the commutation, but who might benefit in connection with the same property.

MR. TOMLINSON was understood to support the Amendment.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the attitude of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General must produce in the minds of hon. Gentlemen the conviction that he desired in the most barefaced manner to collect duty twice over.

SIR J. RIGBY said, that a purchaser after he had purchased the interest in respect of which the commutation had been granted might die, and the reversion might pass from him to someone else. There was no reason why, the reversion so passing, another duty should not be paid.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, it was the same interest that would pass—the interest in expectancy. Until the termination of the expectancy period the property might surely pass from one to another.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 81 ; Noes 124.—(Division List, No. 141.)

MR. R. T. REID moved, in page 9, after Clause 12, to insert the following Clause :—

Exemptions from Estate Duty.

"(1) Estate Duty shall not be payable in respect of a single annuity not exceeding twenty-five pounds purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or arrangement with any other person, for the life of himself and of some other person and the survivor of them, or to arise on his own death in favour of some other person ; and if in any case there is more than one such annuity, the annuity first granted shall be alone entitled to the exemptions under this section.

"(2) Estate Duty shall not be payable in respect of property passing to the Crown or to any institution wholly maintained out of moneys provided by Parliament."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. R. MOWBRAY (Lancashire, Prestwich) said, he should like to know what was meant by—

"Estate Duty shall not be payable in respect of property passing to the Crown or to any institution wholly maintained out of moneys provided by Parliament."

Was not this property to be aggregated ?

MR. R. T. REID said, that an Amendment to this effect was proposed about a month ago, and the Government promised to amend the Bill accordingly. No property would be aggregated for the purpose of raising duty which was not liable to duty itself.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that as he understood it, the first part of the clause was proposed to meet the case of hardship pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin—where two or three elderly sisters not very wealthy enjoyed a small annuity in succession.

MR. R. T. REID said, the clause was intended to meet the case of husband and wife, sisters, and so on.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. BARTLEY said, he would move to extend the exemption to annuities not exceeding £52. He was grateful to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for having adopted this clause in response to appeals from all sides of the House. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would consider the proposed increase unjustifiable ; but the Amendment was insignificant—only 10s. a week, and it must be borne in mind that they were doing all they could to assist people in making provision for old age. It did not seem unreasonable that the exemption should run to £1 per week, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, no doubt, acknowledge that it would have no substantial effect on the Treasury.

Amendment proposed, in line 2, to leave out the word "twenty-five," and insert the word "fifty-two." — (Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'twenty-five' stand part of the Clause."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that in fixing the limit at £25 they had calculated that the maximum capital value of such an annuity would be £300. They did not think it necessary to charge duty on such a small sum ; but he could not accede to the Amendment, because when they came to higher figures it would not be right for them to give special advantages to one particular class of savings. The capital value of an annuity of £52 would probably be between £600 and £700.

MR. BARTLEY said, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer was somewhat exaggerating the Amendment when he said it would run to £500 or £600. It would only be a matter of £200 or £300 for a person 75 years of age. If a man and his wife bought a small annuity and one life dropped after three or four years, the only Estate Duty payable, according to the system now proposed, would be that upon the half. This at the time of the purchase would only have amounted to about £150 ; but as the life would have lasted several years the annuity would be worth less than when it was purchased. The cases would be so few and the hardship so severe that he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer might make some concession. He was afraid that he must take the sense of the Committee upon the proposal, because he thought it was a matter in which the public would feel that some relaxation should be made in the cases of deserving people who were trying to provide for themselves in this small way.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 125 ; Noes 83.—(Division List, No. 142.)

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES moved, in line 9, to leave out all after "the Crown." He said, this sub-section was the exempting sub-section, and he presumed that it embraced all the exemptions proposed to be made. It read—

"Estate Duty shall not be payable in respect of property passing to the Crown or to any institution wholly maintained out of moneys provided by Parliament."

He must call the attention of the Committee to the fact that this thing was entirely new with regard to the exemption from Death Duties. If the words of the old Act had been adopted Estate Duty would not have been payable by any of the Royal Family, but it was now made payable by all those of the Royal Family who did not come under the words "the Crown." What did the "Crown" mean? He had been obliged to go to the Interpretation Act of 1889, and he found that by Section 30 it was laid down that references to the Sovereign or to the Crown were to be construed as references to the Sovereign for the time being. He concluded that those references to the Crown embraced the person of the reigning sovereign, but no other member whatever of the Royal Family. He presumed also that it would embrace what he might call the public Revenue as representing the Crown. But what were "institutions wholly maintained out of moneys provided by Parliament"? There were such as the British and South Kensington Museums, but there were very meritorious institutions like Greenwich Hospital, which was not wholly supported by public money. What, indeed, was an institution? The word was new in an Act of Parliament of this kind. He did not know about Board schools, but was the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself an "institution"? The right hon. Gentleman might conceivably in the future be wholly maintained out of moneys provided by Parliament, and if he was an institution also he would be exempt. He thought the word was extremely vague. As to Greenwich Hospital, it was largely supported, but could not be said to be "wholly maintained, out of moneys provided by Parliament," for it was largely endowed by William III. by the gift of the Derwentwater estates, and by the payments of seamen themselves, out of their wages, of what was called "the Greenwich sixpence." A sum of £10,000 left to the Sovereign would be exempt, and £10,000 left to South Kensington Museum would be exempt, but £10,000 left to Greenwich Hospital in recognition of the services of our veterans at sea would be charged with duty. Surely that was not the intention of the Government, and if it were not the intention of the Government, the words here inserted should be left out. He strongly objected to any institution being allowed to escape the payment of the Estate Duty, whether it be an institution wholly or partly supported by moneys provided by Parliament or voluntary contributions. He could not conceive the justice, for instance, of exempting money left to the British Museum, and charging the duty on money left to St. George's Hospital. It seemed to him that if there was to be any alleviation of the tax at all it should be in the direction of hospitals rather than in the direction of museums. If £10,000 were left to the South Kensington Museum, the result was that the institution received £10,000 more to spend, and that amount of £10,000 was withdrawn from the purview of Parliament. They had endeavoured to raise the question of the Trinity House in that House, with regard to the large amount of money that was affected, and which was taken by the Board of Trade. But they were always told that they could not discuss the whole question of the Trinity House, because there was only £40,000 which could be discussed. He, therefore, asserted that any sum so left, instead of having a greater claim to exemption, had rather a claim to be charged double duty. But why should any Institution whatever be relieved from the taxes which were imposed upon an ordinary individual who came into the succession of a property, real or personal? An individual was often very hard put to it to find the money to pay the duty, and in any case it was certain to cost him great inconvenience. But an institution had no duties to the property, and simply had to spend the money. He submitted that the instances he had given were sufficient to show that the principle here adopted was a wrong one. If they wished to make a proper exemption, for instance, of works of art, there were the words of the old Act, which provided that they should be left for a definite purpose, to be kept and preserved. If an Institution were to sell them and add to its funds, exemption from duty was never contemplated by the old Acts, and he submitted that that should be kept in mind with regard to the new Act. But here there was no such case for exemption. He thought he had given good reasons why the exempting clause of this Bill should deal with all matters of exemption upon some intelligible and consistent principle, and that all the exemptions should be put together. He submitted that that had not been done in this clause. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed to the proposed new Clause, in line 9, to leave out all after the words "the Crown."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the new Clause."

MR. GOSCHEN: On a point of Order, Sir. The hon. Member who has just spoken has raised the point with regard to the interpretation of the word "Crown." If the Amendment which my hon. Friend has moved were put, it would prevent any alteration of the word "Crown." I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether in the word "Crown" any change is made with regard to the existing law—whether the exemption from Estate Duty is limited to the Crown, whereas the exemption from Legacy Duty is extended to the Royal Family. If, in the working of this clause, any substantial alteration is made with regard to the Death Duties generally of the Crown or of the Royal Family, perhaps the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be good enough to explain the point.

SIR W. HARCOURT: This clause was only intended to carry out what I said in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Whitechapel, and was really meant to deal with bequests to the State or to the nation. The hon. Member for Lynn Regis has made the objection that the management of South Kensington Museum might have money to dispose of as they pleased without the control of Parliament. So they might have, and, I imagine, have now. The only thing is, that they will have that sum so much reduced by the Estate Duty. If anybody should leave South Kensington £10,000 the management can deal with it as they like now. That really was and is the sole intention of this clause. It might, perhaps, quite as efficiently have run—"Bequests made to the nation," or "property passing to the nation by bequest."

MR. GOSCHEN: I am quite aware that that is the intention, and the Government have been fulfilling their promise in dealing with this matter, but the right hon. Gentleman has not answered my question. Perhaps the Law Officer will answer it. It is whether the introduction of the words "the Crown," either by accident or by intention on the part of the Government in this particular clause, would in any way alter the incidence of the Death Duties upon any member of the Royal Family. It is a matter of some importance. I give no opinion as to whether it ought to be done or not, but I am clear upon this point, that it ought not to be done by a sidewind or accidentally, without the deliberate intention of Her Majesty's Government. I am sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer will agree with that, and therefore I wish to ask the Attorney General whether the introduction of the words exempting the Crown in this clause would change the incidence of the Death Duties upon Members of the Royal Family as compared with the existing law. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman opposite that there is no controversial point in what I raise, but it would be most undesirable that any change in the Death Duties should be effected without the distinct understanding of the House. My hon. Friend has suggested that the substitution of the word "Crown" for "Royal Family" would make a considerable difference.

SIR J. RIGBY: I wish to answer this question in substance. First of all, supposing that there were no such clause as this, there is nothing that I ever heard of, or remember, to exempt any member of the Royal Family, other than the reigning Sovereign. It would have to be paid by them. This clause does not alter the law in regard to Estate Duty, because it only expresses what, in the absence of the words, would be the law. The exemptions which the Royal Family can claim are by virtue of the Legacy Duty Act, and this clause has nothing to do with that Act, and it does not alter or exempt from Legacy Duty at all. So the result is that this does not provide for any exemption from the new Estate Duty for members of the Royal Family other than the reigning Sovereign. But it does not take away from any members of the Royal Family any exemptions that they now have. I think I ought to say that the Crown does mean the reigning Sovereign.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: I would propose as an Amendment, before that of my hon. Friend, to leave out the word "Crown," because the hon. and learned Gentleman has distinctly stated that the clause as it now stands does not carry out the intention which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has just declared was the intention of Her Majesty's Government. The desire of the hon. Member for Whitechapel, to which the right hon. Gentleman assented, was that a gift to the nation should be free from Estate Duty, while I understand from the hon. and learned Gentleman that that would not be carried out by the words of the clause. Therefore it is perfectly obvious some other word should be added. I beg to move the omission of the word "Crown."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think we had better omit the clause. I have always been very much in favour in framing an Act of Parliament of saying exactly what the meaning of a phrase was. Therefore what I suggest now is to withdraw Sub-section 2, and put it in a different form upon Report. I think that would be the best way of dealing with it.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is proposed to leave out Sub-section 2. The Question is, "That Sub-section 2 stand part of the Clause."

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: Upon this I would venture to repeat to the Committee what I said when this matter was previously under discussion. I think the right hon. Gentleman will find that he is only at the beginning of the difficulty. I am certain, from the Amendments on the Paper, that there was many Members of this House who will not be content to exempt property passing to the nation or to an Institution wholly maintained out of monies provided by Parliament, and not to extend that exemption to property passing to Municipalities for local benefit.

SIR W. HARCOURT: We will consider whether we cannot put our proposal in some more intelligible form, and one which would be less open to criticism than the sub-section as it stands.

Sir J. Rigby

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he would like to point out that at present all the Royal Family were exempted from Legacy and Succession Duty, and the Sovereign personally was exempted from Probate Duty, but they merged the Legacy and Succession Duty of 1 per cent. in the Estate Duty, and they merged the Probate Duty, and if they left it as it was without any exemption the effect would be to remove the exemption from Probate Duty which the Sovereign now enjoyed. He only wished that that might be kept in mind in case any new clause were brought up.

MR. BARTLEY said, that as he had an Amendment to include local rates, he would like to guard himself respecting any fresh clause. It seemed to him that all property given to the country, whether in London or in the villages, should be exempted, as it was most desirable to encourage donations to all parts of the country.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think everybody will recognise the conciliatory spirit which has been shown by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in this Debate, and they will also sympathise with him in the difficulty in which he is placed. My right hon. Friend near me, the Member for Bristol, I think takes a severe view of these bequests, and does not wish any relief to be given to them at all; on the other hand, there are a good many gentlemen on this side of the House, and, I think, on the other side of the House, who say, with some justice, that if money is left for public purposes to the nation as a whole, it shall not pay duty, but should pay duty when left as a fraction, such as in the case of some Municipality or Institution. That being the position in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer finds himself, I cannot blame him for desiring to postpone the full discussion of this subject until Report, though I hope he will not then take the negative attitude recommended by some authorities, but will deal to some extent with this problem. I certainly shall not resist the Amendment which he has proposed, which is that this sub-section be now omitted, on the understanding that it be brought up again on Report. I think the Government have a perfect right to do that if they choose.

MR. FORWOOD said, that when this matter was brought before the House by the hon. Member for Whitechapel, he ventured to put in a claim for Municipalities, and he wished now to press strongly upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer the reasonable claims of Local Bodies to have the duty on any works of art that might be left to them remitted. There could be no question that one of the greatest improvements to the conditions of provincial life was the erection of Art Galleries, Museums, and such local public Institutions, and to place such at a disadvantage in regard to bequests as compared with National Institutions would, he feared, be to check the generosity of donors in this direction. When this matter came up for consideration on the Report stage he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give favourable attention to the claims of local Institutions.

MR. TOMLINSON reminded the Committee of one class of Institutions to which reference had not been made, Institutions of an educational character—Universities and Colleges. Surely the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not wish to subject to Estate Duty a valuable library bequeathed to an Institution of this kind?

Amendment (Mr. Gibson Bowles), by leave, withdrawn.

Question, "That Sub-section 2 stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I desire to submit an Amendment in the form of a new sub-section. I have given a copy to the right hon. Gentleman, and it runs in these terms—

"Property passing to any Institution maintained for a public purpose shall not be aggregated"

—this is the essence of the Amendment——shall not be aggregated with the rest of the property passing on the death of the deceased."

I do not think this needs long explanation; its object will be apparent. It will be observed that it does not relieve property passing to Museums and other Institutions from duty; the duty must be paid, but not after aggregation with the rest of the property of the deceased. The equity of the proposal is obvious on the face of it, but I will give one case by way of illustration which will make the matter quite clear to the Committee. Suppose a man is the possessor of a large amount of unsettled property and a small amount of settled property over the disposal of which he has no control; and suppose he, following bad examples, takes a course not without precedents and quarrels with his heir. He is obliged to leave the small amount of settled property to his heirs, but he leaves the large amount of unsettled property to the nearest Hospital or Museum. Now, what is the position of the unfortunate heir? He not only has to pay Estate Duty on the amount of property he receives, but he has to pay duty on the whole amount of the property, only a small fraction of which comes to him, the rest of it being deliberately left away from him because he happens to have quarrelled with his predecessor. Nobody can say this is equitable. If you wish public Institutions to pay Succession Duty on property they receive by bequest let that be so, but do not make the unfortunate heir pay on the small amount of settled property he gets, and also the Estate Duty on the much larger amount of property going to the public Institution. I give this one case, which perhaps the Government have not realised, and of course there is the other case, in which a man, to spite the heir of the settled property, might leave the remainder of the property to an individual instead of to an Institution; but, taking this commoner case, is it not a fair concession to make, is it not a fair encouragement of the liberality of individuals towards public Institutions to say that when they thus bequeathed property it shall not be subject to aggregation for purposes of duty with the rest of their estate? It is open to argument whether we should grant any great concession in the way of diminution of taxation to property left for public purposes; but I do think that this new principle of aggregation, now introduced for the first time into our fiscal system, should not be used as an engine for checking liberality which would otherwise be exercised. A rich man might leave £100,000 to a public Institution if he knew that the public Institution would pay duty upon that, and that his heir would pay only upon the amount he received. But when he knows that his heir will have to pay taxation on the whole of his aggregated property, he will naturally think twice before he makes that use of his power of leaving money to a public Institution or for public purposes. I think the Amendment is conceived in a not unreasonable spirit, and, without dwelling on it further, I hope the Government may see their way to accepting it.

Amendment proposed, to insert at the end of the Clause, as a new subsection—

"Property passing to any Institution maintained for a public purpose shall not be aggregated with the rest of the property passing on the death of the deceased."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT: This opens up a new point of view altogether. I should like to have time to consider how it will affect the principle of aggregation before I accept it. I am quite willing to take into consideration the point of view of the right hon. Gentleman—which is not unreasonable—and what it may involve. What I feel about all these questions in regard to the distinction of portions of property is, the more we introduce the question who are the beneficiaries the more we detract from the principle of aggregation. There is a line of Pope's—

"Die and endow a College or a cat."

Now I do not know how far the cat may come under the definition of person or individual, and, as I say, I must consider how far this or any proposal will affect the principle of aggregation. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not press his Amendment to-night; but we will take it into consideration and see what we can do with it at a later stage.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I take some blame to myself, and do feel that I have somewhat taken the Government at a disadvantage in proposing this Amendment at such a short notice. I can only say in palliation of my offence that I did raise the point in Debate at an earlier stage. Does the right hon. Gentleman desire that I should withdraw it now in order that it may be considered on Report? I will take any course he likes.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I propose to reconsider the section altogether and bring it up in another form, upon which the right hon. Gentleman can move this or any other Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 2nd July 1894.

FRANCE.

The Queen's Answer to the Address of Tuesday last, reported by the Lord Steward (M. Breadalbane) as follows :

I thank you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful Address.

I share the deep sorrow and indignation which you have expressed at the assassination of the President of the French Republic.

I shall take care to convey to the French Government the abhorrence which, in common with myself, you feel at this detestable crime, and the sympathy which it has called forth for the Family of the late President, and also for the Government and People of France.

THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF YORK.

The Queen's Answer to the Address of Thursday last, reported by the Lord Steward (M. Breadalbane) as follows :

Your loyal and dutiful Address on the occasion of the birth of the Prince, my great-grandson, gives me sincere satisfaction ; and I thank you for the renewed assurance of your loyal affection towards my Person and Family.

Address and Answer to be printed and published. (No. 140.)

PISTOLS BILL.—(No. 40.)

THIRD READING.

Read 3^a (according to Order).

THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD said, he had several Amendments to propose. The first, in Clause 1, to transpose the words "yeomanry" and "volunteer," was merely formal.

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD moved, in Clause 3, an Amendment to enable midshipmen and other officers below the age of 18 to carry pistols when on duty. This point had been brought forward and discussed in Committee.

Moved, in Clause 3, page 3, line 11, after ("pistol") to insert—

("unless he is in the naval, military, yeomanry, or volunteer service of Her Majesty, and is carrying the pistol in the performance of his duty or when engaged in target practice."—(The Earl of Chesterfield.))

Amendment agreed to.

VOL. XXVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD said, the next, in line 12, to leave out "or she," was formal, those words being unnecessary under the Interpretation Act of 1889, by which words implying the masculine included the feminine gender. Another Amendment, in Clause 4, for transposing words was consequential. The object of the next, in Clause 8, was to define the meaning of "chief officer of police in Scotland."

Moved, in Clause 8, page 4, line 21, to leave out from ("and") to the end of the clause and insert—

("'council of a city or borough' the town council or police commissioners, and 'chief officer of police' shall mean the chief officer of police as defined in the third schedule to the Police (Scotland) Act, 1890.")

Amendments agreed to.

THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD moved, in Clause 9, page 4, line 24, after ("constabulary") to insert—

("the expression 'chief officer of police' shall have the same meaning as in the Explosives Act, 1875, subject to the change of designation mentioned in section twelve of the Constabulary and Police (Ireland) Act, 1883.")

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : I think the noble Lord will, by this Amendment, beat the record in the construction of a Reference Clause. I can, of course, quite understand the object of a Reference Clause in legislation ; it is to enable Bills to pass the House of Commons. But I understand this Bill has passed the House of Commons.

THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD : No ; this Bill has not passed the House of Commons.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : Then, of course, it may be necessary ; but it would be more satisfactory, I think, if the meaning of the expression in the Explosives Act, 1875, and the change of designation in the Constabulary and Police (Ireland) Act, 1883, were put into the Bill, because this is a Bill for all kinds of unlearned persons, those under age, peasants in Ireland, and others ; and I am afraid they will find some difficulty in deciphering the strange enigmas which the draftsman has put into the Bill. Even at the risk of making it more difficult for the Bill to pass the House of Commons, I think it would be better if it were drawn in ordinary English.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Earl of ROSEBURY) : The noble Marquess raises rather a large question by that last sentence. I never knew that an Act of Parliament was intended to be a portion of popular literature at all. The noble Marquess has, I think, not only mistaken the object but has forgotten the origin of this Bill. It is the wastrel and derelict child of Lord Stanley of Alderley—I think the noble Marquess must remember the somewhat melodramatic introduction of the Bill in this House ; but it has been entirely changed in Committee. Does the noble Marquess desire to stop the Bill ?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : I only meant to offer my protest against a practice which is growing, and is really making Bills more hopelessly unintelligible than they used to be. But I agree with the noble Earl that it is perhaps hardly worth while stopping the Bill now.

LORD HALSBURY : I would only add that I have repeatedly made that protest sitting in another part of the House, but I do not think I ever remember a Bill so extravagant in its reference as the present one. It really seems as if some person had been trying to discover some mode of rendering the Bill absolutely unintelligible.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL) : This clause was, I believe, inserted in the Irish Office.

A noble LORD : That may account for it.

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD moved, after Clause 10, to insert as a new clause—

“No licence, authority, or permission granted under this Act shall entitle any person to use, carry, or have in his custody or possession any fire-arm in any part of the United Kingdom where that person is by any other Act for the time being in force forbidden to use, carry, or have in his custody or possession any fire-arm, or shall entitle that person to use, carry, or have in his custody or possession any fire-arm unless he has obtained a licence or permission so to do from some authority empowered by that Act to grant such licence or permission.”

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : May I ask what “that Act” means ?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL) : I think “that Act” is some other Act. It is taken from the gun-licensing clause, which provides that licences obtained under that Act shall not entitle the person to carry arms where there is a law forbidding it. This is a provision where persons are not entitled to carry arms.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY : Would the substitution of “such other” for “that” meet the difficulty ?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : I think it would be more lucid.

Moved, to leave out the word “that,” and insert “such other.”

Amendment agreed to.

CARDIFF CORPORATION BILL (by Order).

CONSIDERATION.

As amended, considered.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, that in moving the first of a series of new clauses of which he had given notice, he might point out that his object was the protection of the interests of the commoners of Cantref; although he might be told that those commoners were heard before the Police and Sanitary Committee, his reply was that they were not fully heard. They had met with very harsh treatment at the hands of the Cardiff Corporation, who had alleged that, and acted as if the commoners had no rights at all. Everybody but these poor commoners had been protected. In the first place, the lord of the manor had been squared or settled with, and had no doubt got a good sum of money or other consideration for his rights; other large landowners like Lord Bute and Lord Windsor had had their interests protected, and so had such bodies as the Bute Dock Company, the Glamorgan Canal Company, and the Great Western Railway Company. But the poor commoners, many of whom were in such humble circumstances that they were not even able to sign their names, were left out in the cold. It was all very well to say that when the reservoir required by the Corporation had been built the land used for the railway would be available for the commoners, but everyone knew that such statements by counsel and witnesses before a Committee were worth nothing, and that to ensure protection a clause giving it should be embodied in the Bill itself. As long ago as December, 1893, the Cardiff Corporation took possession of the 10 acres of this common, although they had no right to do so; in fact, they stole, and their principal witnesses before the Committee admitted that they had taken the land and meant to keep it. One would have imagined that a Committee of the House of Commons would have refused to listen to people of that sort, and would have thrown out the Bill. Certainly the Chairman of the Committee did rebuke them by saying that he wondered they had come to Parliament at all; but the Bill was allowed to pass all the same. He noticed in a Paper circulated that morning that the Corporation promised, when the railway was made, to restore whatever was left of the four acres which they still retained of the 10 of which they originally put in the Bill, and if that were a truthful statement, he thought they would at once agree to the clause he was about to propose. He could not understand the ground on which they claimed a right to keep the land. They might say that the commoners would be paid for any privileges of which they were deprived, but he was instructed to say that they did not want compensation ; all they desired was that as soon as the reservoir was built the land should be given up to them for grazing and other purposes. This was a case of land-grabbing by a wealthy Corporation, which had been able to square the lord of the manor. He begged to move the first of the new clauses standing in his name.

New Clause—

(For the protection of the commoners of the parish of Cantref.)

"The land, part of the common lands of the parish of Cantref, taken for the making of the railway between Nos. 1 and 2 Reservoirs, shall be only taken temporarily, and shall not be fenced ; and as soon as No. 1 Reservoir is completed the railway shall be entirely removed, and the surface of the common lands restored as far as possible to its original condition."—
(Mr. A. C. Morton.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Clause be read a second time."

*SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff) said, his task had been rendered rather difficult by the extraordinary manner in which the hon. Member had raised this question, and by his allegation that a Committee of that House had refused to protect the interests of commoners, while looking after those of everybody else. He had told them that Lord Tredegar had been squared and that the Marquess of Bute and other landowners had been settled with. Well, it was a fact that the Cardiff Corporation had settled with those gentlemen, and it was equally a fact that in the same way they sought to settle with the commoners. The hon. Member had virtuously professed to the House that the commoners did not require any compensation ; but if they had not demanded an exorbitant and ridiculous sum in the first instance, this matter would never have come before the House. The four acres of land to which this Bill referred were situated between the two Corporation reservoirs. Much had been said about the Corporation having violently appropriated the land ; but he remembered being at the opening of No. 1 Reservoir, and it was then thought by the authorities that that would be sufficient to meet the necessities of the town for some years. But the growth of Cardiff had since been so enormously rapid and the increase of population so large that a second reservoir had become necessary, and it was to facilitate its construction that the railroad was needed. Cantref Commons contained in all 2,615 acres, and all this fuss was being created over a strip of four acres. Originally it was proposed to take 10 acres, and for their grazing rights on that quantity the commoners asked £3,000. For the rights on four acres they demanded £750, and if this price was applied to the whole common it would give the value of those rights at the modest figure of £1,960,000.

MR. A. C. MORTON : But this bit of railway would cut the common in two.

*SIR E. J. REED denied that, and said the accepted demand of the commoners was that there should be no fence, while when the Corporation had no further use for the land they would take up the line. The Corporation felt that they ought for future purposes to retain possession of this land, but they were prepared to allow the commoners to have the fullest use of it. The commoners would suffer no real injury, and he therefore thought it was straining the sense and judgment and the procedure of the House to seek to interfere with a measure which had been so carefully considered and settled by a Committee. It was not likely that a body composed as the Committee was would have failed to protect the interest of the commoners. They had done all that was necessary, and he hoped the House would reject the hon. Member's proposal.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby) said, he happened to be Chairman of the Committee before whom the Bill was heard, and as the hon. Member had made various sweeping allegations as to the conduct of that Committee, he must ask leave to say a few words on the subject. The inquiry into the Bill was a long and complicated one, and it was a fact that the Committee came to the conclusion that the Corporation of Cardiff had acted in a high-handed way at the commencement of its operations in this matter. They were on that account the more anxious to consider the case of the commoners, and to do all they could to meet it. That case occupied the attention of the Committee for several days, and eventually they inserted a proviso which he believed protected the commoners from every injury that could possibly be done to them under the Bill. Of course, as the Cardiff Water Supply was being taken from that source, it was out of the question to allow sheep washing or anything else likely to contaminate the water, but ample provision was made to compensate the commoners for the loss of drinking and washing places, and for any expense they might be put to in taking their sheep longer distances for washing purposes. The Committee gave full consideration to this Bill, and a more improper and more ridiculous opposition to a measure was never imposed upon the House. While the Bill was under consideration the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) intimated to him his intention of raising the question before the House. He did not suppose the hon. Member intended by that to make the Committee more careful as to what they were doing, but he did say it was a poor reward to the Committee, who gave up so much time to the consideration of the Bill, if, after the Bill had been wholly and patiently considered, the circumstances were to be reviewed in this partial and one-sided way in this House, and the House was to be asked on evidence of that character to reverse the conclusions deliberately come to. He did not intend to take up the time of the House, but he ventured to express the hope that the House would arrive at such a decided decision on this particular clause that the hon. Member would not consider it worth while to take the matter further in respect to the other clauses.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. MELLOR, York, W.R., Sowerby): Under the circumstances, I ought not to allow this matter to pass without saying a word with regard to the Bill now before the House. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is an appeal from the decision of the Committee of the House which has inquired into the whole matter, which has discussed it for a considerable number of days, and which has had before them all the necessary materials for coming to a decision; and having heard the evidence and discussed the matter; and having, as anyone may see who takes the trouble to look at the Bill, given ample compensation to every right the commoners possess, this appeal is now made to the House of Commons to reverse the decision of the Committee. It is to put, as I think the Chairman of the Committee is right in suggesting, a slight upon the Committee in respect of this particular matter, and I may say if the House allows appeals of this sort to be brought into the House from the decision of the Committees which are carefully selected, and who devote a great deal of time to the discussion of these Bills, it will be fatal to the good conduct of the Private Business of this House. I think it is time I should call the attention of the House to this matter of Private Bills, as several appeals have been made to the House from Committees lately. What is the object of the system of sending matters of inquiry to Private Bill Committees? It is because you cannot, on ex parte statements in this House, come to a sound and just conclusion with regard to many of these matters. To consider the matter properly you must examine witnesses so as to go into the questions in detail, and, therefore, so far as regards matters of this kind, they are usually delegated to the Committees, and I must say, upon the whole, the Committees of the House of Commons have done their work remarkably well. But I ought to add that this is an appeal from one of the strongest Committees of the House, the Police and Sanitary Committee, which has earned the gratitude of the House of Commons and of the country by the manner in which they have discharged their important and heavy duties. Under the circumstances, I hope the House will support the Committee. I am afraid that unless these Committees are supported you will not get Members of the House of Commons to undertake such duties, knowing that very probably the decision they come to will be appealed against.

*MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth), as a Member of the Police and Sanitary Committee, agreed with every word that had fallen from the hon. Gentleman who presided over that Committee as to the prejudice that was created in their minds by the manner of one of the witnesses who gave evidence. From what they then thought was the action of the Cardiff Corporation they met, it might almost be said, prejudiced against the Cardiff Corporation, and they listened with the greatest care and with a special desire to guard the rights of these commoners. He had been on the Committee for several years, and no such amount of time was ever before given to such an inquiry. He believed that the Committee gave the commoners all they were fairly entitled to, and that there was no ground for the suggestion made that these people had suffered or were likely to suffer a wrong under the Bill as passed by the Committee upstairs, and he hoped that the House would support the Committee in the view they had taken.

*SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle) said, he wished to express the satisfaction with which he had heard the remarks that had fallen from the Chairman of Ways and Means. Latterly they had been brought down to the House time after time, at three o'clock, upon comparatively small questions relating to Private Bills, though, of course, they might be of considerable local interest and importance, where the decisions of Committees of this House had been called into question. He felt certain if this House attempted to review the working and labours of Committees they would get themselves into very great difficulty indeed. The House was a most improper tribunal to re-take evidence, as it were, on the ex parte statements of a Member like his hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton), who no doubt in this case took up the case in the interests of the commoners, and brought it before the House after it had been thoroughly investigated before a Committee of the House. He would warn the House against reviewing these decisions except on far stronger evidence than that which had been brought before them. He thought they owed a debt of gratitude to the Chairman of Ways and Means for the manner in which he had dealt with the question.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) said, he was desirous of saying just a few words upon this matter with regard to the action of the House in reviewing the decisions of Select Committees. It appeared to him that if they had a power to review these decisions it was their duty to do so whenever a case was made out that showed the decision to have been a hasty or wrong decision. Unless it was clearly made out that the Committee had done wrong, they ought not to reverse the decision of the Committee; but if it was made out that the Committee had gone wrong, it was their duty to deal with the matter, and they should then be bold enough to reverse the decision of the Committee if they considered it advisable to do so. Of course, he knew there was very great difficulty in the matter. If the Opposition took head before it went to a Committee, it was always said, "Oh, let it go before the Committee and they will deal with the evidence," and then when it came back to the House it was always said, "The Committee has dealt with it, and as they have heard evidence and fully inquired into the case you must be wrong to interfere with what the Committee has done." By this process the House would strip itself of all power to deal with these matters which were the subject of private legislation. He thought the true view to take was that when a Committee had gone wrong the House should deal with the matter, but it should be fully made out that the Committee had gone wrong. He protested against its being assumed that it was a slight upon the Committee; on the contrary, he thought that every Member of the Committee would agree that if the Committee had gone wrong that their decision should be reversed. In regard to this particular case, he understood that, without having any actual right, the Cardiff Corporation had laid down these railways in defiance of the rights of the commoners, the law being that they had no right to lay them down without coming to terms with the commoners. The Chairman told them the Committee considered carefully this high-handed Act, and the difficulty was to consider what was the precise point they were disputing about, because on the one hand the hon. Member who spoke on behalf of the Corporation said they had no intention of keeping the railway on the land, and on the other his hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) told them all he desired was something that would bind the Corporation to take away the railway as soon as the work was completed. Under those circumstances, he should have thought the Corporation would have given the pledge asked for.

SIR E. J. REED said, he distinctly stated that the Corporation had given the pledge asked for.

Mr. H. J. Wilson

MR. DODD said, in that case there ought to be no difficulty in its being embodied in the Bill. If the Corporation had not been guilty of this high-handed proceeding they would be content with their undertaking, but, under the circumstances, he thought the House might venture to ask for more than the undertaking. For that reason he supported the hon. Member for Peterborough. Let him say that he quite understood the Chairman of the Committee when he said they had given great care to this matter, and at the same time he fully appreciated the meaning of the point the hon. Member used with regard to the arguments on behalf of the commoners being unintelligible and not put so clearly as those on behalf of Lord Bute.

MR. W. LONG said, he did not know whether the hon. Member referred to him, but he said nothing about the kind of arguments on behalf of Lord Bute, because they were not addressed to the Committee, being settled out of Court. What he said was that the views of the commoners were not put before them in a way that it was capable for them to understand them.

MR. DODD regretted that he had misunderstood the hon. Gentleman, but he thought that Lord Bute's name was mentioned; he was much obliged for the correction, but he did not think it interfered with his argument, which was that the commoners being more or less uneducated people, they did not seem to have conducted their case with the same skill that it would have been conducted by people of greater influence.

MR. W. LONG pointed out that the commoners did not appear in person, but through a competent and able counsel.

MR. DODD said, that that being so there was no force in the statement of the hon. Gentleman, when he said the Committee did not understand the argument of the commoners.

MR. W. LONG said, he was sorry to interpose, but the hon. Member was misrepresenting what he said. What he stated was, that the Committee listened to the case of the commoners with the utmost patience, but that it was put before them in a manner that it was difficult to understand the immediate drift; yet so anxious were they on behalf of the commoners that they allowed the arguments to be put before them at great length.

MR. DODD was glad to hear the explanation that the Committee did eventually understand the argument that was put forward. He thought this was one of those cases where they were able to form an opinion themselves, and, under the circumstances, he would ask the House to say that the railway ought to be taken away on the completion of the work.

*SIR E. J. REED said, it was not a question of removing the railway, but of putting the land back into its original condition.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, that perhaps he might be allowed to observe there was nothing in the Bill about taking the railway away, if there had been they would have been satisfied.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 39 ; Noes 163.—(Division List, No. 143.)

MR. A. C. MORTON said, that in moving the second Resolution standing in his name he should like to explain—[Cries of "Agreed!"]* If hon. Gentlemen would agree to the Resolution he would sit down. He would like to take this opportunity of saying that the reason that these small commoners were not so ably represented before the Committee was because they were poor men and unable to find hundreds and thousands of pounds to fee expensive counsel. He admitted they were not strongly represented before the Committee. The Chairman of the Committee had said he (Mr. Morton) was good enough to inform him that he intended to bring this matter before the House. That was true, but the hon. Gentleman should have told them what he also told the hon. Member. He asked the hon. Member to get the Committee to consider these proposals, and the hon. Member told him they would consider them.

MR. W. LONG said, he did not know what the hon. Member was referring to, but he made no promise of any sort or kind, and he never saw the Amendments in question until he saw them to-day. He did not know what on earth the hon. Member meant.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he maintained that the hon. Member promised the Committee would consider the Amendments if they were placed before the Committee, and that thereupon they were printed and taken to the Committee, but the Committee afterwards would not consider them. He was astonished to hear the Chairman of Committees upbraiding him (Mr. Morton) for attempting to present the poor commoners' case.

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. Member is now moving Clause No. 2; he cannot go over the whole statement of what passed in Committee; he ought to limit his arguments to the particular clause he now moves.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, he quite understood the Speaker's ruling, but he thought he might take the opportunity of answering the scolding they had got from the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Mellor).

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is not in Order in discussing other matters.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, the object of the clause was for the watering of flocks, herds, and stock. Under the Act of 1884 the Corporation, in respect of No. 2 reservoir, were bound to provide compensation water to the extent of 3,000,000 gallons in every 24 hours—that was to say, they were to run that quantity down the stream; and as to No. 3 reservoir, they were bound to allow compensation water to the extent of 4,000,000 gallons in every 24 hours. When they were coming to Parliament for an easement they should allow some compensation water for the use of the flocks and herds of these commoners. The reply of the Corporation was that there would always be water running down. In the summer months there would be practically no water running between the two reservoirs. He thought that all those who were interested, whether as commoners or otherwise, had a right to compensation water. The Committee had not protected their interests at all, although Parliament, in the Act of 1884, did so to the extent he had mentioned.

New Clause—

(For the watering of flocks, herds, and stock.)

"2. The Corporation shall cause to flow at all times from No. 1 Reservoir along the natural channel of the River Taff, through the common lands, in a continuous flow, not less than five hundred thousand gallons of water in every day of twenty-four hours, for the watering of the flocks, herds, and stock grazing on such lands."
—(Mr. A. C. Morton.)

Mr. A. C. Morton

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR E. J. REED said, the speech the House had just heard had been made exactly 10 years too late, and it really had no relevance to the Bill. The moving of this new clause was an attempt to induce the House to go back upon the legislation of 1884. This was not a Bill for the creation of reservoirs, and it did not in any way interfere with the water of the river. The proposal made in the clause was urged upon the Committee over and over again. The hon. Member for North Birmingham (Mr. Kenrick) happened to be in the Chair on one occasion when the proposal was made, and he said—

"We have already said we cannot go into this question. The Committee cannot go behind the Act of 1884, and the powers given by that Act."

This was the keynote of the Committee's action, and it would have been quite ultra vires for them to have dealt with this question in the manner proposed. He trusted that the House would not accept the clause.

MR. W. LONG said, he wished to say a word in personal explanation after what the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) had said. All he had told the hon. Member for Peterborough was that if any point in connection with the rights of the commoners should be raised on the clauses which had not been dealt with by the Committee on the Preamble the Committee would, of course, see that justice was done. The whole question was considered, and he believed the Committee had given a just decision with regard to it. He did not think that it would now be possible to go back upon the determination arrived at by the Committee.

MR. A. C. MORTON: May I say that all these Amendments were handed in to the Committee?

MR. W. LONG: And considered.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he wished to move the clause he had placed on the Paper respecting sheep-washing, but he would not trouble the House to divide upon it. The Committee had not taken the same course as was taken by the Committee who sat upon the Birmingham Bill in 1892. He believed the commoners would have got on better with the Committee if the Chairman had been able to be present on every occasion, but Derby Day had intervened—

*MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Member whether he is going to move this clause?

MR. A. C. MORTON: I am going to move it, Sir.

MR. SPEAKER: I understood the hon. Member to say that he was not.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I am going to move it, and if a Radical House like this—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member will proceed.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he was about to say if Derby Day had not intervened—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! This is the second time I have called the hon. Member to Order.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I will say no more, but will move the clause.

New Clause—

(Sheep-washing.)

"3. If the Corporation interfere with the use of any sheep-washing place or places, either on any inclosed lands of the commoners or on the open common lands, the Corporation shall provide other suitable sheep-washing places as near as possible thereto, together with convenient access and egress to and from the same for the sheep, and proper resting and drying grounds and accommodation, and shall further pay annually to the commoners or commoner affected by such interference the amount of any increased charge or of any loss sustained in consequence of using a less convenient washing-place than that now enjoyed by them or him: Provided that in case any substituted washing-place may be reasonably considered by any commoner to be too inconvenient to make use of, on account of distance or other cause, the Corporation shall in such case make full and adequate compensation yearly to such commoner for the loss sustained by him."—(Mr. A. C. Morton.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. DIAMOND (Monaghan, N.) said, that as a Member of the Committee who was not present when the decision was given in the Cardiff Bill, but who had attended numerous other meetings of the Committee, he felt bound to state that the Chairman had been present day after day and week after week ever since the Committee was appointed. He would go further, and say that the rights of every individual, particularly if such individual were unable to put forward his own claim, were considered by the Committee in every possible way. No question of Party had arisen, and when the Committee was dividing there was a great deal of cross voting. The Chairman and the Members of the Committee certainly did justice to the Cardiff Bill, and he felt bound to support their decision, although he was not present when it was arrived at.

MR. WASON (Ayrshire, S.) said, he was utterly at a loss to understand why the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) had attacked the Chairman of the Committee. The Bill was most carefully considered in respect of every detail. It would have been impossible for any Committee to be presided over by a better Chairman, and political differences had been quite unknown on the Committee.

MR. MALLOCK (Devon, Torquay) said, he was present at all the meetings of the Committee on the Cardiff Bill. He believed the Chairman was very seldom absent from the meetings, and when he was absent it was to attend the Committee on the Acceleration of Registration Bill.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, N.): As a Member who was not on the Committee, I should like to protest against the way in which the House of Commons is constantly asked to revise the proceedings of Committees upstairs without having any evidence to go upon. It is a very bad innovation, which has grown up only during the last two or three years, and it will lead to very serious consequences if it is largely pursued. The object of the establishment of Private Bill Committees is that evidence can be properly heard which the House cannot hear. The House is, therefore, bound not to accept these very improper Motions.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he desired now to move a new clause respecting arbitration. He did not see why the Committee should not have adopted such a clause. By the Act of 1889 Parliament had provided a very useful measure of arbitration, and he asked that in case of any difference arising that Act should be made to apply. He thought he might fairly press this proposal, because the Bill already gave the County of Brecon exactly the clause which he wanted for the commoners, whilst it also gave the Great Western Railway Company an Arbitration Clause.

New Clause—

(Arbitration.)

"4. Any difference which may from time to time arise between the commoners of the parish of Cantref collectively, or any individual commoner, and the Corporation, as to the amount of compensation payable to such commoners or commoner in respect of the taking of any lands, temporarily or otherwise, over which they have the right of common, or in respect of any injurious affection of any other lands over which they have the right of common, by exercise of the powers conferred on the Corporation by this Act or the Act of 1884, or as to the carrying out of the duties imposed by this Act on the Corporation of providing sheep-washing places, and a continuous and sufficient flow of water for watering stock between Nos. 1 and 2 reservoirs, such differences shall be settled under the provisions of 'The Arbitration Act, 1889,' by a single arbitrator, to be appointed on the application of any party in difference by the Board of Agriculture"—(Mr. A. C. Morton.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Clause be read a second time," put, and negatived.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, he had now to move his barbed wire clause. In a paper which had been sent round that morning, the promoters of the Bill said there were no fences, but it was stated on page 46 of their own Bill that there were fences in which they had to put gates. It was therefore evident that the paper circulated among Members was incorrect in this particular, as well as in others. The clause he proposed was accepted by the Corporation of Birmingham in 1892.

New Clause—

(Barbed Wire.)

"5. The Corporation shall not use any barbed wire in connection with the erection or maintenance of any fences or otherwise."—(Mr. A. C. Morton.)

Mr. A. C. Morton

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Clause be read a second time," put, and negatived.

Ordered, That Standing Orders 223 and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the third time.—(Dr. Farquharson.)

(Queen's Consent signified),—read the third time, and passed.

ASSASSINATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

*THE VICE CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Mr. C. R. SPENCER) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as followeth:—

I thank you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful Address.

I share the deep Sorrow and Indignation which you have expressed at the Assassination of the President of the French Republic.

I shall take care to convey to the French Government the Abhorrence, which in common with Myself you feel at this detestable Crime, and the Sympathy which it has called forth for the Family of the late President, and also for the Government and People of France.

T.R.H. THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF YORK.

THE VICE CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Mr. C. R. SPENCER) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as followeth:—

I thank you for your loyal and dutiful Address on the occasion of the Birth of the Prince, My Great Grandson.

It affords Me much Satisfaction to receive this Assurance of your Attachment to My Person and Family.

LIFE SENTENCES IN IRELAND.

MR. HOPWOOD (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Kirwan, convicted of the murder of his wife by drowning her near to Ireland's Eye, off Howth, afterwards respited upon doubts raised, and the sentence of death commuted to penal servitude for life, in the year 1854, was detained in prison until 1892, or 38 years, and then released; whether his case was considered in the interval, and what reasons prevailed at last for his release which ought not to have had effect earlier; whether it is the rule in the Irish prisons, as in the English, that a sentence of penal servitude for life is fulfilled by 20 years' imprisonment; whether revision of cases of prisoners (without friends) under sentence for long periods is periodically made; and what officer is charged with the duty of bringing such cases before the Lord Lieutenant?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): In the first place, I would point out that Kirwan was sentenced to death for murder in 1852 (not 1854); the sentence was subsequently commuted to penal servitude for life, and he was released on licence in 1879, and not in 1892, as wrongly stated in the question. His case was considered, on memorial, on several occasions in the interval, and his release was ordered on the ground that his life would be endangered by further confinement in prison. As to the third and fourth paragraphs, the rule hitherto in force in Ireland has been that no expectation of release could be held out to convicts undergoing a life sentence until the completion of 20 years, except in cases where sentence of death had not been recorded, which were specially submitted for consideration at the end of 15 years. The cases of other long-sentence prisoners are not brought specially to notice at stated intervals; but the cases of prisoners, whether sentenced for life or for a lesser term, are brought under consideration from time to time, irrespectively of the periodical review of their sentences—for example, on application from the prisoners or by others on their behalf, or when the medical officer reports that further imprisonment would be likely to endanger the prisoner's life, or whenever any special circumstances exist affecting the prisoner's position. It is the duty of the Prisons Board to submit such cases to be laid before Government.

RELIGION OF PAUPER CHILDREN IN SCOTLAND.

MR. O'DRISCOLL (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if his attention has been drawn to the decision of the Board of Supervision, authorising the registration as Protestants of two boys named Slaven on their admission to the Edinburgh Workhouse, although the parents of the children were Catholics; is he aware that the boys, being aged respectively 11 and 13, were officially declared Protestants at the request of their stepmother, despite their Catholic parentage; does the law of Scotland regard a child as in his pupillage until the 14th year, and have the Scottish Courts recently refused to allow children under that age the choice of religion, and decided that they must be brought up in the religion of their father; has any settled principle been laid down for the Scottish Poor Law Authorities to follow in the case of the religion of orphans; is the religion of the parents decisive when the children are under age, or will the wishes and statements of strangers in blood to the orphans be followed where they have acquired temporary control over them on the parents' death; and, if no fixed Rule exists, will the Government, in view of the feeling excited by the Slaven case amongst the Catholic community in Scotland, request the Board of Supervision to frame Regulations setting forth, in the case of pauper orphans under 14, when the parents' religion is to decide the question of registration, and when not?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): I am informed by the Board of Supervision that the children named Slaven, aged respectively 11 and 13, became chargeable on the 5th of January in the present year immediately before the death of their stepmother (with whom they lived), which occurred on the 11th of January. While living with their stepmother, these boys and an elder sister were educated as Protestants, and the stepmother is certified to have belonged to a Protestant congregation, and to have been a communicant. Under these circumstances, and after careful inquiry and consideration, the Board came to the conclusion that effect ought to be given to what was ascertained to be the wish of the children—namely, that they should remain Protestants. The rule of the Board is, in registering such cases, that the child must follow the denomination of the last surviving parent, but it is subject to exception in cases where, from the accident of residence or otherwise, the religious teaching of another denomination has been received, and has been so far imbibed as to produce in the minds of older children a decided preference. I am not aware of the decision of the Scottish Courts referred to, but the present practice of the Board of Supervision is in accordance with the law. It does not appear that any additional Regulations are required. The children in question are not in the work-house, but are boarded in the country.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork) asked whether the Board's action was based upon the provisions of the law, or upon its own views of what was right?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I will ascertain that. I may say that the Parochial Board which took the initial step was not actuated by any religious bigotry or even partiality. The father died in 1892, and inquiries were made at the time respecting the entry.

MR. M. HEALY asked if the right hon. Gentleman would say at what age children were considered old enough to select their own religion?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: That depends; but these children were aged 11 and 13, and for the last two years and a-half or three years have been, as I say, educated as Protestants before they became chargeable.

ALLEGED RAILWAY NUISANCE.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received complaints with respect to the rattling of loose plates upon the bridge of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway which crosses Tarn Street, Newington, S.E., whereby the inhabitants of the houses in the vicinity suffer great inconvenience, being unable to get proper sleep; whether he is aware that the Railway Company in question has been appealed to in vain to put a stop to this nuisance; and whether he will take steps to see that the provisions of Section 7 of "The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway (Further Power) Act, 1884," which bear directly upon this matter, are immediately carried out?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The Board of Trade have received no complaints, but the company inform me that having received a complaint from one resident with respect to the noise referred to they had, before this question appeared on the Paper, given instructions to their engineer to proceed forthwith to remove the plates. The work will now be commenced at once.

POST OFFICE SERVANTS AND DISTRICT AND PARISH COUNCILS.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is intended to issue any Regulations relative to the election as members of District or Parish Councils of persons employed in the Postal Service, or to their action in matters relating to the operation of "The Local Government Act, 1894"?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): Regulations applicable to the whole of the Civil Service have been issued by the Lords of the Treasury, and immediate steps will be taken to make them known throughout the Post Office. Under these Regulations officials of the Post Office will be enabled, subject to certain restrictions, to become candidates for Parish Councils but not for District Councils.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): The Treasury in this matter have made a mistake.

MR. A. MORLEY: My attention has not been called to it; but I will make inquiries.

PETTY SESSIONS COURT AT LETTERBREEN.

MR. M'GILLIGAN (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that there was no Court of Petty Sessions held at Letterbreen, County Fermanagh, on the 15th instant, owing to the non-attendance of Magistrates; and whether, having regard to the statement recently made that appointments at an early date would be made in Fermanagh, can he say when such appointments will be made?

MR. J. MORLEY: The fact is as stated in the first paragraph, though I am informed that this was the only occasion during the past 12 months that the Petty Sessions referred to fell through because of the non-attendance of Justices. I am in communication with the Lord Chancellor regarding the inquiry in the second paragraph of the question.

FORCED LABOUR IN EGYPT.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that Her Majesty's Agent and Consul General for Egypt has stated in his recent Report that there was corvée in Egypt during 1893, affecting 86,615 peasants, and amounting to 6,001,886 days of forced, unfed, and unpaid labour, which is an evil and a hardship; whether "the whole of the men were called out in the usual manner by means of the Mudirs"; and, if so, what is meant by these words, and what is the form of compulsion now in use; whether an experiment was tried as to about 2 per cent. of these labourers, by which, although forced to serve, they received two piastres daily, and whether this experiment was successful; and whether he is aware that the Inspector General of Irrigation for Lower Egypt has expressed the opinion that the entire body of 52,223 men requisitioned in the Delta would have turned out on the banks without compulsion, and worked for an average of 82 days, on the assurance of this wage (Egypt p. 35); and that the total winter corvée in 1884 exceeded 5,100,000 days' labour, which, added to the 6,001,886, would give a total of 11,101,886 days' work, of the value, at two piastres, (5d.) per day, of £222,036; and whether the sum of £400,000 paid in the years 1890, 1891, 1892, and 1893 by the Caisse of the Dette Publique to the Public Works Ministry, under instructions from the Powers, as a Trust Fund, to be applied to the abolition of involuntary labour, has been so applied?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say—1. The 86,615 men mentioned in Mr. Garstin's Memorandum attached to the Reports by Her Majesty's Agent and Consul General in Egypt were called out for the corvée last year during the time of the Nile flood, and must have been employed, on an average, for 70 days, their duty being to mount guard on the embankments which protect their own village lands during the flood. 2. The Memorandum further states that the whole of the men were called out in the usual manner by the Mudirs. The Mudirs keep a register of the men available for this work. They are called out whenever the river reaches a certain gauge in August, and if they fail to answer they may be prosecuted. 3. The experiment of paying 2 per cent. of the labourers two piastres a day was tried, but the Memorandum already quoted states that there is a difference of opinion as to its results. The Inspector General of Irrigation for Lower Egypt was no doubt right in saying that for two piastres a day men could easily be got to work during the Nile flood; but the hon. Member is mistaken in his calculation of the number of days' labour of the winter corvée of 1884. Her Majesty's Government are informed that the number of days' labour executed by the corvée in that winter in Upper and Lower Egypt was 16,518,100, or with this amount of labour (which at two piastres per head a day would have cost £330,362), and with £19,250 spent on dredging, and a special fund of £27,219 spent in clearing the canals of Menoufieh and Gharbieh, the canals were very imperfectly cleared, and nothing was spent on clearing the drains. The sum of £400,000 is annually spent in keeping the canal and drainage works and the embankments in order without the use of the winter corvée. Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff estimated in 1886 that this would cost £455,508 a year, allowing nothing for the corvée employed during the Nile flood, but after certain improvements had been made it was found possible to do the work for £400,000.

MR. S. SMITH: Is it the intention of the Government to persevere in the use of forced unpaid labour in Egypt?

*SIR E. GREY: I have explained the difference between the two corvées. The Egyptian Government are now making an experiment with the object of doing away with the only remaining one. Whether that experiment will make it possible to do away with the exceptional corvée the hon. Member refers to I cannot say.

MR. PIERPOINT (Warrington): Is there not a sum of money devoted by the Egyptian Government to the doing away with this corvée?

*SIR E. GREY : According to what I believe to be the case, a sum was devoted by the Egyptian Government to making an experiment. That experiment has been made, but only recently, and I cannot say what the result will be.

MR. PIERPOINT : Has the whole of the money been spent in doing away with the corvée ?

*SIR E. GREY : The experiment has been made, and I presume the money destined for making the experiment has been spent on it.

THE CASE OF MR. HARRY HALL.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) : I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will state what action, if any, has been taken against Mr. Harry Hall, sporting tenant, of Inverinate Lodge, Kintail, Ross-shire, for assaulting and threatening to shoot Farquhar Chisholm, fisherman, of Letterfearn, Ross-shire, on the night of the 30th May last ?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, Clackmannan, &c.) : I am informed that Mr. Hall was tried summarily in the Sheriff Court at Dingwall on the 21st of June, on the charge of assaulting Farquhar Chisholm on the 13th of May last, and that, after hearing the evidence, the Sheriff found him not guilty.

COMMANDEERING IN THE TRANSVAAL.

SIR E. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) : I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is correct, as stated in the telegrams from South Africa, that British subjects in the Transvaal have been forcibly commandeered and sent in prison waggons to fight in the Boer Army ; and, if so, what action Her Majesty's Government propose to take ? I also desire to ask the hon. Gentleman if he can inform the House as to the reply given by the Transvaal Government to the protest made by Her Majesty's Government against the commandeering of British subjects for military service in the Transvaal ; and whether the British subjects already commandeered have been released from service ?

The following questions were also on the Notice Paper :—

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) : To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if, under the Convention of 1884 with the South African Republic, Her Majesty's Government still retained the suzerain power in the Transvaal ; whether he is aware that, whilst negotiations are pending between the Government and the Boers, British subjects resident in the Transvaal are being forcibly impressed into the military forces of the Boer Republic, and sent as prisoners to the front ; and whether such action will be permitted in regard to the personal liberty of the subjects of the suzerain power in the Transvaal ?

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) : To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with regard to the fact that the Convention of August, 1881, concedes to the Transvaal State complete self-government, subject to the suzerainty of Her Majesty, and that in the Convention of February, 1884, which replaces that of 1881 with the South African Republic, no mention is made of any claim to suzerainty, whether, in agreeing to the Convention of 1884, it was the intention and purpose of Her Majesty's Government effectively to waive all claim to suzerainty over the territories in question ; and, if so, for what main reason was this course adopted ?

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL : To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government of the South African Republic has now granted to aliens exemption from military service upon payment of a special tax ; what is the amount and character of this tax ; and is the privilege extended to burghers of the Republic ?

MR. DARLING (Deptford) : To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the South African Republic has lately violated Article 15 of the Convention concluded on 27th February, 1884, between Her Majesty and the South African Republic ; whether, at the time of concluding such Convention, Her Majesty was and still is Suzerain of the Transvaal ; whether under that Convention British subjects are liable to military service under a Foreign Republic ; and whether the subjects of other Sovereigns than Her Majesty are by Treaty excused from such service ?

every injury that could possibly be done to them under the Bill. Of course, as the Cardiff Water Supply was being taken from that source, it was out of the question to allow sheep washing or anything else likely to contaminate the water, but ample provision was made to compensate the commoners for the loss of drinking and washing places, and for any expense they might be put to in taking their sheep longer distances for washing purposes. The Committee gave full consideration to this Bill, and a more improper and more ridiculous opposition to a measure was never imposed upon the House. While the Bill was under consideration the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) intimated to him his intention of raising the question before the House. He did not suppose the hon. Member intended by that to make the Committee more careful as to what they were doing, but he did say it was a poor reward to the Committee, who gave up so much time to the consideration of the Bill, if, after the Bill had been wholly and patiently considered, the circumstances were to be reviewed in this partial and one-sided way in this House, and the House was to be asked on evidence of that character to reverse the conclusions deliberately come to. He did not intend to take up the time of the House, but he ventured to express the hope that the House would arrive at such a decided decision on this particular clause that the hon. Member would not consider it worth while to take the matter further in respect to the other clauses.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. MELLOR, York, W.R., Sowerby): Under the circumstances, I ought not to allow this matter to pass without saying a word with regard to the Bill now before the House. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is an appeal from the decision of the Committee of the House which has inquired into the whole matter, which has discussed it for a considerable number of days, and which has had before them all the necessary materials for coming to a decision; and having heard the evidence and discussed the matter; and having, as anyone may see who takes the trouble to look at the Bill, given ample compensation to every right the commoners possess, this appeal is now made to the House of Commons to reverse the decision of the Committee. It is to put, as I think the Chairman of the Committee is right in suggesting, a slight upon the Committee in respect of this particular matter, and I may say if the House allows appeals of this sort to be brought into the House from the decision of the Committees which are carefully selected, and who devote a great deal of time to the discussion of these Bills, it will be fatal to the good conduct of the Private Business of this House. I think it is time I should call the attention of the House to this matter of Private Bills, as several appeals have been made to the House from Committees lately. What is the object of the system of sending matters of inquiry to Private Bill Committees? It is because you cannot, on ex parte statements in this House, come to a sound and just conclusion with regard to many of these matters. To consider the matter properly you must examine witnesses so as to go into the questions in detail, and, therefore, so far as regards matters of this kind, they are usually delegated to the Committees, and I must say, upon the whole, the Committees of the House of Commons have done their work remarkably well. But I ought to add that this is an appeal from one of the strongest Committees of the House, the Police and Sanitary Committee, which has earned the gratitude of the House of Commons and of the country by the manner in which they have discharged their important and heavy duties. Under the circumstances, I hope the House will support the Committee. I am afraid that unless these Committees are supported you will not get Members of the House of Commons to undertake such duties, knowing that very probably the decision they come to will be appealed against.

*MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth), as a Member of the Police and Sanitary Committee, agreed with every word that had fallen from the hon. Gentleman who presided over that Committee as to the prejudice that was created in their minds by the manner of one of the witnesses who gave evidence. From what they then thought was the action of the Cardiff Corporation they met, it might almost be said, prejudiced against the Cardiff Corporation, and they listened with the

HACKNEY CARRIAGE LICENCES IN THE METROPOLIS.

MR. E. H. BAYLEY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the amount of the accumulated surplus from hackney carriage licences (drivers and proprietors) and from stage carriage licences?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): There is no accumulated surplus, for under the Act 32 & 33 Vict., c. 115, the fees "are carried to the account of the Metropolitan Police Fund," and are not kept as a separate fund. The question of the amount and disposal of the cab-plate revenue is one of the subjects referred to the Committee now sitting to inquire into the Metropolitan Cab Service, and will receive their fullest consideration.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM BUILDINGS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether any steps are being taken with reference to the preparation of the working drawings of the approved plans of the proposed new buildings of the South Kensington Museum, with a view of carrying out the undertaking that the works shall be begun next year?

MR. A. MORLEY (for Mr. H. GLADSTONE) was understood to say that it was proposed to resume work in the autumn so as to have everything ready for the commencement of the buildings as soon as the money had been voted by the House of Commons.

MOUNT PLEASANT MONEY ORDER OFFICE.

MR. BARTLEY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General when the Report by Dr. Corfield on the sanitary condition of the Money Order Office, Mount Pleasant, will be published?

MR. A. MORLEY: I hope to be able to lay the Report by Lord Playfair and Dr. Corfield on the sanitary condition of the Money Order Office on the Table of the House by the end of the present week.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.): Has the right hon. Gentleman been able to give effect to any of the recommendations in the Report?

MR. A. MORLEY: Several minor matters have already been dealt with, and others are under consideration.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): How long is it since the Post Office received the Report?

MR. A. MORLEY: Three or four weeks ago.

SECONDARY EDUCATION IN AYRSHIRE.

MR. WASON (Ayrshire, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether the Scotch Education Department have been informed that the Ayr County Committee, who submitted a scheme for the disposal of the funds for secondary education (which was approved by the Department), are about to distribute these funds amongst all the ex-VI. scholars in the county, entirely ignoring Section 17 of the Minute of the 1st May, 1893; whether, if this be done, there will be a great waste of public money, to the loss of the schools entitled to receive the grant; and whether he will prohibit this being done until the schools are certified in the terms of the Minute, the Department having all information necessary to enable it at once to grant the required certificate when it is warranted in doing so; and what means do the Department propose to use to prevent public funds being wasted by a violation of the provisions of their own Minute?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The policy of the distribution of the funds for secondary education in terms of the scheme submitted and approved, is one for which the County Committee is entirely responsible. Their proposal to distribute the money in such a manner that efficient schools scattered over the country within reach of the rural scholars can share in it is, on the face of it, reasonable. There is a difficulty in requiring a retrospective certificate before paying money which had accrued before the 31st of March last; but the Department will take steps to enforce certificates before any further grants are paid. Even now grants are only paid to schools which are known to the Inspector as efficient.

WORKMEN'S TICKETS ON ENGLISH RAILWAYS.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he could, with the assistance of the principal Railway Companies, furnish to this House a Return showing the extent to which they issue cheap workmen's tickets with a condition exempting the Company from liability if the workmen are injured on the journey or killed by a railway accident; and if such a Return could be furnished in the form asked for on the Paper, or in some similar form?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): I cannot promise the hon. and learned Member the Return to which he refers; but, as I informed him privately some days ago, I have directed communications to be addressed to some of the principal Railway Companies on the subject, and hope, before long, to be in a position to inform him of the result.

VENTILATION ON THE METROPOLITAN RAILWAY.

✦ Mr. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the fact that well-known experts declare it to be perfectly practicable to render the foul atmosphere in the tunnels of the Metropolitan Railway pure by a proper arrangement of large fans for extraction, whilst Sir Benjamin Baker, in his Report to the Metropolitan Railway Company, states that, for various reasons, the system of exhaust fan ventilation employed in 1892 was practically impossible in the case of the Metropolitan Railway, will he place upon the Table of the House a Copy of Sir Benjamin Baker's Report?

Mr. BRYCE: The Metropolitan Company have informed the Board of Trade that Sir Benjamin Baker's Report is of a private character, but that the General Manager will be happy to show it to the hon. Member if he makes an appointment with him for the purpose.

CHURCH PROPERTY IN WALES.

Mr. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomeryshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how soon the Return of Property of the Church in Wales, ordered on the 31st of May last, will be in the hands of Members?

Mr. ASQUITH: I understand that it is now mainly a question of printing, but it is hoped that it will be ready for presentation by the end of the month.

THE WELSH LAND COMMISSION.

Mr. HUMPHREYS-OWEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, having regard to the importance of the inquiries now being held by the Welsh Land Commission, the evidence already taken by them will be presented to Parliament?

Mr. ASQUITH: The preliminary Report and two columns of evidence will be presented to Parliament to-day.

THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT IN SCOTLAND.

Mr. SEYMOUR-KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether all the County Councils in Scotland, other than the Councils of county burghs, have appointed committees to consider whether the circumstances of the county justify the Council in putting into operation Part I. of "The Small Holdings Act, 1892," as required by Section 5 of that Act; whether he will give the names of those County Councils whose committees have decided this question in the affirmative; whether he will give the names of those County Councils who have received Petitions from county electors praying that this part of the Act may be put in operation; whether the committees, on receipt of the Petitions, forthwith caused an inquiry to be made in each case as required by the Act, and what was the result of such inquiry; in what counties in Scotland is this part of the Act now in operation; and to what extent has land been acquired under it, either by purchase or lease, and sold or let for small holdings?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: In December last a Circular was issued by me; and in May last another Circular was issued by the President of the Agricultural Department to County Councils, calling for information on the subject referred to by the hon. Member. The replies received from the County Councils, who have all, excepting Kinross, appointed committees in terms of Section 5 of the Small Holdings Acts, were in the majority of cases to the effect that the Act was not in operation, owing to the absence of any demand for small holdings. In the Counties of Argyll, Bute, Elgin, Fife, Orkney, Renfrew, Roxburgh, Stirling, Sutherland, and Kirkcudbright applications were received, but the County Councils, after due inquiry and consideration, resolved not to put the Act into operation. In the Counties of Aberdeen, Berwick, Inverness, and Wigtown applications were also received, and inquiries appear to be still pending. The County Councils of Berwick, Inverness, and Ross alone appear to have definitely resolved to put Part I. of the Act into operation. In the case of Ross and Cromarty 86 acres of land have been purchased by the County Council as an experiment, but the arrangements for re-sale in small holdings are not yet completed.

MALICIOUS INJURY CLAIMS IN KERRY.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at the Listowel (Kerry) Presentment Sessions, on the 6th of May, 1892, a presentment for compensation for malicious injury to the houses of Michael and Thomas Dillane was rejected, on the ground that the law requiring service of notice on two inhabitants of the parish had not been complied with, and that the Grand Jury, on the same ground, at first refused to entertain the presentment, but being informed by Mr. Justice O'Brien that they had a right to award compensation, adopted the presentment and imposed a levy of 1s. in the £1, about half the members of the Grand Jury refusing, however, to associate themselves with this proceeding; and whether any legal means are available to the cesspayers concerned of appealing against the action of the Judge of Assize in reversing the decision of the Presentment Sessions, notwithstanding the rule of law respecting notice?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that the claims of Michael and Thomas Dillane were rejected at the Listowel Presentment Sessions held on May 7, 1892, because the notices had not been duly served. Subsequently the claims were renewed before the Grand Jury at the Kerry Summer Assizes, when compensation was awarded. The Attorney General advises that the presentment having been made by the Grand Jury, and fiat by the Judge of Assize, and there being no illegality on the face of it, there is no remedy by appeal or otherwise. The local police are unable to say whether any of the Grand Jury referred to associated themselves with the adoption of the presentment, and the secretary of the Grand Jury states it would be impossible to ascertain this information.

MR. SEXTON: Does the Attorney General say whether the law as to the necessity of serving notices on the two principal inhabitants of the parish holds good or not?

MR. J. MORLEY said, he would ascertain as to that.

LANCASHIRE CHARITIES.

MR. SNAPE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I beg to ask the Parliamentary Charity Commissioner why, in reply to a letter from a meeting of the parishioners of West Derby addressed to the Charity Commissioners in September, 1892, respecting the Glest and Aspe Charities, the desired information has not yet been given; whether it was desired by the last settlement of those charities that they should be vested in three trustees; and, if so, why only one has been appointed, and he a young rector recently appointed; why no communication was made to the Overseers, who are the legal custodians of such charities, before that nomination was made and advertised; whether two Magistrates of the City of Liverpool, resident in West Derby, have been nominated as Trustees by a public meeting of the ratepayers of that township, and whether those gentlemen will be appointed; why the accounts of these charities are not published, and are not laid before the ratepayers at their annual Vestry meeting; who is the treasurer of the trusts; are the accumulations banked; who are the recipients of the money; and what steps are taken to make known to the inhabitants of West Derby that the income of these charities is available for paying the cost of apprenticeship of poor children, and in what manner the children so apprenticed are selected?

*THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. F. S. STEVENSON, Suffolk, Eye): (1) Protracted inquiries were necessary before complete reply could be made to a letter of the 30th of September, 1893 (not 1892). A reply was sent on the 28th of June. (2) The last Order of the Board discharged the three then Trustees and appointed three Trustees in their place. There is now only one vacancy caused by death of the late rector of West Derby, in place of whom the other two Trustees have proposed the present rector. In Apse's Charity the rector of West Derby is directed to be a Trustee under the instrument of Foundation, and the two charities have for many years been administered together. (3) The Overseers do not appear to have any legal control over the charities. (4) A Committee of Ratepayers on the 23rd of June last suggested for appointment two gentlemen who are understood to be J. P.'s and residents in West Derby. This suggestion with others is under consideration. (5) The attention of the Trustees was directed to the provisions of the law in regard to accounts in November last. (6) The Commissioners are not aware that any person has been appointed as a Treasurer; the accumulations are banked; the recipients of the charities are the children apprenticed. (7) In 1887 the Commissioners were informed that all the clergy were written to concerning the charities, and that the Overseers printed a notice at the back of their demand notes, and that the then rector as the acting Trustee, made personal inquiries as to the fitness of applicants. The object of the Commissioners in the present proceedings is merely to fill up the present vacancy, and leave to the Local Authorities to consider hereafter the application to the charities of the Local Government Act, 1894, when it comes into full operation.

Sir G. Trevelyan

MR. SNAPE: May I ask why, although these charities are not restricted to any particular denomination, the whole of the trustees appointed are members of the Church of England? Cannot Non-conformists be chosen?

*MR. F. S. STEVENSON: That will be considered. But as regards Apse's Charity, there is a provision in the original deed that the rector of West Derby shall be one of the Trustees.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN THE NEW-CASTLE WEST UNION.

MR. M. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the cause of the delay in not having an Inspector sent from the Local Government Board to hold an inquiry into a proposed scheme of labourers' cottages in Newcastle West Union, it being the first on the list for consideration according to a reply given in April, as also the usual preliminaries required by law having been complied with in February last?

MR. J. MORLEY: On Friday last I caused a letter to be written to the hon. Gentleman stating that the 21st of August was the earliest date that could be fixed for holding an inquiry in this case, owing to the other engagements of the Local Government Board Inspector.

THE CONGO TREATY.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government consulted with the great Powers interested in the regions affected by the Congo Treaty of the 12th of May before making that Treaty with the King of the Belgians?

*SIR E. GREY: No other Powers were consulted, because it was not believed that other Powers except those whose rights were specially reserved would be affected by the Agreement.

POSSESSION OF FIREARMS IN IRELAND.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that James Cashin was recently arrested in Tipperary, drunk, with a loaded revolver in his pocket; what punishments were inflicted on him, and whether he was licensed to carry firearms; and will he explain why, notwithstanding his conviction, James Cashin has been permitted to retain his revolver, and has been granted a licence under the Arms Act?

MR. J. MORLEY: The facts are correctly stated in the first paragraph. Cashin was fined 10s. for being drunk, and a further sum of £2 10s. and costs for carrying a revolver without a licence under the Gun Licence Act. He had no licence under the Peace Preservation Act, nor has he been granted such a licence since his conviction. Moreover, the revolver was at once taken from him, and has been forfeited to the Crown.

THE SALARIES OF THE CROWN LAW OFFICERS.

MR. DARLING (Deptford) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, under the recently-issued Treasury Minute relating to the remuneration of the Attorney General and Solicitor General, it would be possible for the Law Officers to accept any private practice whatever ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) : Certainly not. It is stated expressly in the Minute, not only that they accept no future private practice, but that they give up the retainers already received. If the hon. Member reads the Minute he will see that is the effect.

MR. DARLING said, there was a good deal of misapprehension about this, and he was not able to obtain the Minute in question. He asked whether the Government had taken care to provide, now that the Law Officers were to be remunerated by a specified sum per annum, that as many briefs would be sent to them as to the Attorney General last year ; and whether the Treasury would see that the Law Officers did as much work under the new arrangement as they did when they were paid by fees.

SIR W. HARCOURT : My experience of the short time I was a Law Officer was that there was always a desire to give the Law Officers as much as possible to do.

MR. DARLING : But now the arrangement is altogether different. Will the Treasury be just as jealous to see that the Law Officers do as much work as when paid by fees ?

SIR W. HARCOURT : I think questions of this kind had better be deferred until the Estimate comes on.

THE COURSE OF BUSINESS.

MR. HANBURY : Can the Chancellor of the Exchequer state in what order Supply will be taken this week ?

SIR W. HARCOURT : I hope to be able to state to-morrow what Votes in Supply and in what order will be taken after the Committee stage of the Finance Bill is concluded. I am inclined to think that the first Estimates will be the Army Estimates.

MR. HANBURY : Will they be taken for the remainder of the week ?

SIR W. HARCOURT : I hope not.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) : If the Finance Bill is finished to-night, will the Army Estimates be taken to-morrow ?

SIR W. HARCOURT : It will be Supply to-morrow, but I cannot state this afternoon the order in which the Estimates will be taken. I have an impression, however, that the Army Estimates will be taken to-morrow, and Estimates of one kind or the other will be taken all the week. The Report of the Finance Bill will be taken on Monday next. I will state what Supply will be taken on the Motion for the Adjournment of the House.

LAND GRANTS IN WALES.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil) : I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the absence of the Attorney General, whether he has yet had an opportunity of perusing the grants to Sir William Herbert of certain lands in the Counties of Glamorgan and Monmouth, and the schedules and particulars appended thereto ; whether he is aware that in all the manors granted to Sir William Herbert, all woods, underwoods, wardships, marriages, mines, quarries, and other royalties are reserved to the Crown ; whether copies of the grants referred to will be laid upon the Table of the House ; whether the Government intend to instruct experts acquainted with the country fully to examine all grants of land made in the Counties of Glamorgan and Monmouth with a view of giving information to Parliament as to the rights of the Crown ; and whether the royalties in the counties referred to amount to about £500,000 sterling per annum ?

SIR W. HARCOURT : I can give the hon. Member no information on these matters.

MR. PRITCHARD - MORGAN : Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure the attendance of the Attorney General to-morrow to answer the question ?

SIR W. HARCOURT : He was here just now. I can promise the hon. Member he shall receive the information he desires.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCE BILL.—(No. 190.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 29th June.]

[TWENTY-THIRD NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) moved, in page 11, after Clause 16, to insert the following clause—

(Exception as to property in British Possessions.)

(1) "Where the Commissioners are satisfied that in a British possession to which this section applies duty is payable by reason of a death in respect of any property situate in such possession and passing on such death, they shall allow a sum equal to the amount of that duty to be deducted from the Estate Duty payable in respect of that property on the same death. (2) Nothing in this Act shall be held to create a charge for Estate Duty on any property situate in a British possession while so situate, or to authorise the Commissioners to take any proceedings in a British possession for the recovery of any Estate Duty. (3) Her Majesty the Queen may, by Order in Council, apply this section to any British possession where Her Majesty is satisfied that by the law of such possession either no duty is chargeable in respect of property situate in the United Kingdom when passing on death, or that the law of such possession as respects any duty so chargeable is to the like effect as the foregoing provisions of this section. (4) Her Majesty in Council may revoke any such Order, where it appears that the law of the British possession has been so altered that it would not authorise the making of an Order under this section."

He said, he hoped that upon this subject there might be a pretty general agreement, because this clause was really, as regarded the colonies at least—he was not speaking now of foreign countries—a compound of Amendments standing on the Paper in the names of gentlemen of great authority on this subject sitting on the other side of the House. It practically embodied the Amendments on the Paper in the name of the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight, and, except that it did not deal with foreign countries, it embraced, he thought, all the principles contended for by the hon. Member for the Kirkdale Division of Liverpool, whose zealous interest in the colonies in this matter was well known. The Amendment introduced the principle of reciprocity. The hon.

Member for Kirkdale desired by his Amendment that there should be an equivalent exemption given on the part of the colonies. That the Government had endeavoured to introduce by the machinery of Orders in Council, which was the ordinary machinery in these cases, and he believed was especially agreeable to the colonies as marking their direct relation to the Crown. Then it was desired that there should be a special declaration that we did not here pretend to charge property situated in the colonies or in British possessions. That was the statement which was contained in the Amendment of the Member for Kirkdale, and they had practically incorporated it in the clause. The real truth was that it was so in the Bill, but there was a desire that it should be made clear beyond all doubt that the Government did not profess to charge property in the colonies or to exercise any supervision over it. As regarded personal property—real property, of course, was out of the question—whether it be in foreign countries or in the colonies, Legacy Duty now was recovered, not as against the property, but as against the executor here in respect of the assets which were at his hand. That being so, he hoped that the Government had practically satisfied, as regarded the colonies, the views expressed by the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight and the hon. Member for Kirkdale. But he observed that the hon. Member for Lynn Regis (Mr. Gibson Bowles) proposed also to introduce foreign countries. To that the Government would not accede. They were extremely willing to give the colonies their preference in this matter, and no doubt it was a very solid preference; but they could not give them a solid preference to the degree which would enable them to have advantages as against England altogether. They did give them this advantage: that they made it impossible in their case that double duty should be charged, and to that extent they were placed in a preferential position as compared with foreign countries. He did not know whether it had entered into the mind of anyone that this was an infringement or evasion of the Most-Favoured-Nation Clause. The colonies were not excluded from preferential treatment in consequence of this clause. He need only give one instance. In the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1885 a distinction was made in respect to foreign securities, and at this moment a stamp of 10s. was charged on the Government securities of foreign countries, while only 2s. 6d. was charged on colonial securities. He did not mean to say that the Colonial Authorities would not have been better satisfied if they charged nothing at all, but they had endeavoured to meet the practical argument that under the Bill colonial property would be charged a double duty. This clause secured that if the colonial duty was equal to the duty charged here, then the duty would not be charged here, and the property would not bear a double duty. They must deal with the matter in this way, otherwise it was obvious that a man, a month before his death, might draw a cheque and transfer all his personal property to colonial banks and escape the duty altogether. There could not be a more easy means of evasion. But if a man found that the duty was an equivalent duty there was no temptation to evade it in that way. That showed the necessity for some arrangement of this character. He thought it was a fair arrangement, and hoped it would commend itself to the House.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had at last given them what was his opinion as to dealing with certain objections to certain clauses in this Estate Act. He would begin by differing from the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon a point of principle. The right hon. Gentleman told them the object of the Government by this new clause was to give a preference to the colonists. He (Sir G. Baden-Powell) did not wish for any differential treatment, but he wished to explain the rights of the colonies in this matter. He had made extensive inquiries not only from the Representatives of the Colonial Governments, but also from representative colonists in England, and he was convinced that if the clause was put forward as meeting the rights of the colonies it would stir up serious dissatisfaction in the immediate future. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had burked discussion on this subject on several occasions by telling the House that conferences and negotiations were in progress with the Representatives of the colonies.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he had received two letters from the hon. Member asking him whether it was desirable that the discussion should be deferred until the negotiations with the Colonial Representatives were closed.

*SIR G. BADEN-POWELL said, that referred to quite another matter and not to the question now raised, which he had had upon the Paper ever since the Bill had been introduced. All he wished to point out was that they had never been able to discuss the matter in the House—

SIR W. HARCOURT: I made a statement in this House as to what I was going to do, and the hon. Member wrote to me a letter of extreme approval, and said that what I had done had been received with great satisfaction throughout the colonies.

*SIR G. BADEN-POWELL said, that what he referred to was the fact that the matter had never been discussed, and even now he had no idea what the terms of the Amendment were until he saw it on the Paper on Saturday morning, and he was very much surprised to notice that it did not carry out what he understood to be the conditions laid down by the Representatives of our colonies, and they knew by the Paper for which he moved, and which was laid on the Table of the House, that it did not carry out the expressed wishes of the Agents General. With reference to the wording of the clause, the second two lines of the second clause carried out what he thought the whole clause ought to be—

"Nothing in this Act shall be held to create a charge for Estate Duty on any property situate in a British possession."

If that was the whole clause it would be a perfect clause, but then these two lines flatly contradicted the first part of the clause. The second part of the clause was absolutely in the terms of his own Amendment which he had on another page. The third paragraph, which stated that Her Majesty might by Order in Council apply this section to any British possession on property "while so situate," he did not quite understand. The fourth paragraph, in which Her Majesty in Council might revoke any such Order in Council in any colony under the conditions there set forth, was unnecessary, and in any case he thought the Order would not be possible. He had carefully considered the working of this clause, and he thought these objections certainly militated against its practical usefulness. The clause as it stood was really contrary to the principle which ought to underlie any clause dealing with taxation in our colonies. The Chancellor of the Exchequer apparently did not yet appreciate what the difficulties were of attempting to levy any such tax, and he would briefly run over one or two practical objections to this tax before he came, very shortly, to describe the constitutional position. The first practical point was this. He did not see how by this Act the right hon. Gentleman could in any way bring any revenue into the Exchequer, and if they did not gain any money by this agitation, and causing this friction through the colonies, surely it would be wise now to drop any such action. He knew it was of enormous value to the Exchequer to follow up the principle of broadening the basis of taxation; and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer could by any such means increase his basis of taxation, so that it should cover the whole world, he quite agreed that the right hon. Gentleman would achieve an enormous advantage to future Chancellors of the Exchequer as well as to himself. But the Government had conceded in this Amendment a very important point but one which he did not think needed conceding—namely, that they could not pay twice over the same Queen's taxes on the same property. That, he understood, had been illegal all along, and he happened to know at least one case where taxes were charged twice on the same property in Australia. The case was given against the man who had been forced to pay, but on appeal home it was shown to be illegal to pay the Queen's taxes twice on any property; therefore, he did not think any trouble need be taken in regard to this fact of property being taxed twice over because it was distinctly illegal to so tax it. But in conceding the remission of duty that had been already paid it meant that in all our colonies steps had been or would soon be taken to place the duties there on an exact equivalent to this duty at home. In the Provinces of Canada which had the right of imposing direct taxes, the lower duties did exist because of the unpopularity of increasing in amount this Death Duty. If the financial Officers and Ministers of these Provinces could go to their Representative Legislatures and say, "It is no longer a question of imposing duty or increasing duty, you will have to pay this high duty now, because of what the Imperial Parliament has done, but you had better pay it to us than to the Chancellor of the Exchequer," then these Legislatures would allow these duties to be raised exactly to the amount charged in London, and in that case the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have created all this machinery and also have caused all this great friction in our colonies, and yet not one penny would come to the Exchequer. There were other difficulties in connection with such action. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had already alluded to gentlemen being able to place money in a colonial bank and so escape the duty. It was quite possible that gentlemen might do so now provided that money did not have to pay Legacy or Succession Duty. But there was great difficulty in regard to executors. An executor must either be domiciled in this country or in one of the colonies. If he was domiciled in a colony, there was no Court in this country which had jurisdiction over him in getting any return of accounts and any payment. That was a very easy way of avoidance of this tax. Then, again, the valuation of properties in the colonies would be a source of difficulty and expense. There were other difficulties in the way of collecting such a duty, such, for instance, as the ease with which domicile could be changed in the British Empire. He believed that already one or two wealthy residents in this country had even expressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer their intention of changing their domicile if this Bill became law. He was alluding to these difficulties to show that in the opinion of experts any clause which tried to levy Estate Duty in our colonies would not result in gain to the Exchequer, and he did not see why this House, composed as it was of practical men, should attempt to impose on our colonies any scheme of taxation which would not result in any gain to the Exchequer. He wished now to allude to what he would venture to call the rights of our colonies. This House, without doubt, had conceded to our self-governing colonies independent legislative and executive sovereignty so far as matters of taxation were concerned. He thought there was no one who could doubt that had been done, and he thought it would also be conceded when they had delegated the power which they had the right to exercise or to delegate, they could not both delegate and exercise the power. Without doubt they had done this, and he might bring forward one instance which, he thought, must have escaped the observation of the authorities who had drafted this Bill. It was an instance of legislation by the Imperial Parliament. In the Imperial Act, by which they enabled the Provinces of North America to federate into one dominion in 1867, the Dominion Government by the Imperial Act was expressly forbidden levying any direct taxes, and that prerogative of taxation and of legislative and executive sovereignty was expressly reserved to the Provincial Governments. How, therefore, this Parliament was to take the double step of not only levying direct taxes in the Canadian Dominion, but levying them in spite of this particular clause and gift of power to the Provincial Governments he could not see.

Sir W. Harcourt

SIR W. HARCOURT: We do not exercise power in the colonies any more than in France. France is independent, and we do not tax property in France. Canada cannot be more independent than France is, so far as legislation is concerned.

*SIR G. BADEN-POWELL said, he was not now dealing with foreign countries, but his point was that they had delegated the full right of taxation, and now they were about to levy taxes on property in Canada. He knew the right hon. Gentleman did not wish him to say he ever even suggested such a thing as that the colonies ought by this means to contribute to the Imperial expenditure. But the answers of the right hon. Gentleman led a great many hon. Members and the public to think that he did entertain such a view. As regarded Canada, he thought it would be quite sufficient for any gentleman who understood this matter when he said that for many years past Canada had been paying more than the fixed sum of 1,000,000 dollars for the purpose of defending the territories of the Empire subject to the Canadian Government. He knew also that the colonies not only had this delegation of the powers of self-taxation, but they exercised it, and if they added up what was raised by self-taxation in various parts of the Empire they would find it came to the very respectable total of £50,000,000 sterling, so that they were not dealing with a mere legal or legislative fiction, but with a great and important fact. He would like to observe with regard to this duty that whether they remitted anything or not they were certainly extending the duty to property situated in the colonies. It had been said that they were only doing what was done now; that was to say, the Legacy and Succession Duties now applied in the colonies. But all that was arranged in the last century, long before the grant of self-government and self-taxation to our colonies, and the burden had fallen so lightly on them that the action of the Home Government had not been contested. But though that might give the right of user, it did not make it right in principle, and this attempt to largely increase the duties payable on legacies and succession had aroused the colonies to the idea that even that taxation ought to have been remitted and made good. It had been shown by some writers, notably by Professor Dicey, in regard to aggregation and graduation, and in the fact that this Bill made Legacy and Succession Probate Duties, they did, as a matter of fact, largely increase the taxation of property in the colonies which would otherwise have escaped. There was one great point in regard to this which he thought was conclusive, and that was that in levying taxes on property situated in the colonies, and especially such heavy duties as were proposed under this Bill, they did, as a matter of fact, diminish, even if they did not destroy, the capacity of that particular property to yield taxation to the Queen, and in that case they certainly interfered in a very serious and material manner with the right and power of the colonies to raise their revenue from their property in the way which best suited them. He had now gone through some of the objections, and he hoped in the concluding remarks he should make that the right hon. Gentleman would see that there was very good reason, if it were possible, to insert as a new clause to deal with the taxation of the colonies the first two lines of Sub-section (2). He had in his hand a great many letters. He was not going to read them, but he should like to quote one written by a very distinguished colonist, and a man who was intensely loyal, as all colonists were. He said—

“It would be possible, perhaps, to levy these taxes on colonial property, but it would certainly lead to the independence of the colonies.”

The colonial men in England, men who understood colonial affairs and politics, had sent a memorial to the right hon. Gentleman in which the results were summed up in words to the effect that the proposal to include for Estate Duty personal property situated outside the United Kingdom would lead to the gravest inconvenience, and injustice would be thereby caused to great numbers of Her Majesty's subjects. The Royal Colonial Institute used those words, but there were even graver words used by the responsible representatives in this country of the Colonial Governments, and who were dead against a clause of this kind. They regarded it as contrary to their rights, as unjust, and totally inadequate to meet the representations which they had made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That Memorial was written long before this clause was drafted.

*SIR G. BADEN-POWELL said, that was the very reason why he wished to read it. The right hon. Gentleman, in his conference with the Representatives of Colonial Governments and in his remarks in introducing the clause that day, led them to understand that the clause, if it did not, really ought to satisfy Colonial Governments. But here were the recorded views of these Governments. They said—

“The proposal to levy the Estate Duties on property located in the colonies will be regarded there as a tax, not on British subjects, but on colonial property, and consequently as a serious interference with a field of taxation which they regard as constitutionally their own.”

And then they used these words, which alone should be sufficient to make any right hon. Gentleman in that House anxious to see that the clause should be in harmony with the representations made on behalf of these great colonies—

“Our Governments take exception to property in the colonies being charged with these Death Duties, and feel entitled to ask on what principle of constitutional right this is sought to be done. We belong to the Empire, and inasmuch as the Imperial Parliament has granted to us responsible and Parliamentary Government, with the right to impose taxation on our people to meet the requirements of State, how can the exercise of the proposed interference by the Imperial Parliament be possible without first suspending our respective Constitutions?”

He said that these words, penned by the responsible Representatives of 10,000,000 of Her Majesty's subjects, ought to and must receive full and adequate consideration in the House of Commons. At this moment, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed for the first time to levy duties on foreign and colonial property, there was a Conference at Ottawa of Colonial Representatives for the purpose of considering how best to consolidate the Empire, and some words were used by the distinguished Prime Minister of Canada, which the House would do well to bear in mind at this juncture. He had said—

“Colonial Conferences had previously met on the American Continent to discuss plans for separation. This one was ‘to plight anew our faith in one another, never yet tarnished, and our affection for the mother-land.’”

At this moment they ought, in any taxation which in any way affected the colonies, to pay the greatest heed to the representations and voices of these 10,000,000 of our fellow-subjects; and although he himself felt that this matter ought never to have been introduced into this Bill, he could not help thinking that now it had been introduced they should come out of it in a perfectly easy and simple way if, instead of adopting the clause as it stood, they inserted only these words from the second sub-section—

“Nothing in this Act shall be held to create a charge for Estate Duty on any property situate in a British possession to which has been granted the right of levying taxes for the requirements of the State.”

He appealed to the Committee, and especially to those Members of all political Parties who had formed themselves into what was known as the Colonial Party, not to pass this clause as it stood, but to pass it in such a form as should uphold the acknowledged rights of our colonies in the matter of self-taxation, and above all things to carry out the expressed wishes of the authorised Representatives of these colonies.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that the hon. Member stated that to tax the colonies would be an invasion of the rights of the colonies, and yet the hon. Member himself had an Amendment on the Paper for the very purpose of levying taxation upon the colonies. It was to be found on the Paper long after the Memorial to which the hon. Member had made reference.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL said, that when it was reached he had intended to ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, the Amendment had been upon the Paper as the view of the hon. Member who said he represented what was called the Colonial Party in this House, and he (Sir W. Harcourt) had paid great consideration to that Amendment in the light of the knowledge of the relation in which the hon. Member stood to the colonies and to the Colonial Party. Let the Committee see what it was the hon. Member had himself proposed. He said it was unconstitutional—

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: I have never proposed that Amendment, and did not intend to.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that at any rate it had been on the Paper in the hon. Member's name to this very day, and he supposed there was a time when he thought it was perfectly constitutional to do what he proposed to do in his Amendment. That Amendment had been on the Paper for weeks, and he had never removed it since he was acquainted with the Memorial of the colonists. Here was the hon. Member's view as expressed in his Amendment:—

"From the full Estate Duty payable under this Act, the Commissioners shall allow to be deducted such sum or sums as shall be shown to their satisfaction to have been lawfully paid as Death Duties on property situate in foreign countries, or in any colony or dependency of the British Empire, to the government of the country in which such property is situate, and in which equivalent exemption is granted in respect of Death Duties payable there on property situate in the United Kingdom."

Therefore, the hon. Member claimed the right to place the taxation on the property in foreign countries and in the colonies, subject only to the deduction of the amount of the tax being levied in that country in which the property is situate and in which equivalent exemption is granted in respect of Death Duties payable there on property situate in the United Kingdom. That clause is identical in principle with the first clause of the Amendment he (Sir W. Harcourt) had proposed, and for the hon. Member at this time of day to turn round and say it was unconstitutional and an invasion of the rights of the colonies was one of the most remarkable things he had ever witnessed even in that House. Then the hon. Member said that the rights of the colonies should be safeguarded by a declaration, and he made the following declaration:—

"Nothing in this Act shall be held to apply to property situate in any British colony to which has been granted responsible Parliamentary government, inclusive of the right to levy taxes for all purposes of State."

As regarded the colonies, the proposal of the hon. Member was, and had been up to the moment when he rose to speak, identical with the proposals of the Government. There could not be any doubt about that. Put the hon. Member's two clauses together and they were practically identical with the proposals of the Government. The hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight, he supposed, might be said to represent the legal views on the constitutional question on the other side of the House, and what did that hon. Member say in the Amendment he had put down—

"The amount of duties lawfully payable on the death of the deceased in any British colony or dependency in respect of property therein situate which is liable to Estate Duty under this Act shall be deducted from the amount of Estate Duty payable in respect of such property."

Then again the proposal was identical with that in the clause of the Government, and therefore they had the conjoint authority of the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight and the hon. Member for West Derby for treating this matter in exactly the way they proposed to treat it. The hon. Member opposite said the Government had no right to exercise legislative or taxing authority in Canada. Of course not, and they did not pretend to do anything of the kind. Neither had the Government the right to tax people in France. The Government had no intention of taxing a foreign country or people, nor of taxing the property of such country or people. The proposal of the Government was to tax the executor or representative here of a domiciled Englishman. If the mere transfer of property to a colony for a day was to exclude it from taxation, that would be to defeat the tax altogether. Some representatives of the colonies were not at all sorry that the rich absentee colonist should be taxed, and it was only the representative of the absentee colonist that the Bill would touch. The cases in which the tax would be collected would not be numerous; and although the colonists would doubtless prefer that no charge should be made, such total exemption would be putting a tremendous premium on colonial investments. The hon. Member should repudiate his own thunder. It was a little disappointing to the Government that, having arrived at the same conclusion as was expressed in the Amendment of the hon. Member and the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight, they should be now met with opposition on the part of the hon. Member.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): I think it is extremely desirable that we should discuss this very important question without any reference to the wording of any particular Amendments and without any reference to Party, or to the particular side of the House on which we sit, because we stand in the presence of claims from the colonies on the one hand, and of certain demands that are to be met on the other. We must all be anxious that the colonies should have extended to them every indulgence and consideration, but I cannot agree with the colonists that their rights have been invaded by the proposals of the Government. This seems to me to be a question of expediency. There were many reasons why the original proposals of the Government should be opposed; but I agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this is not a proposal to tax colonial property or to interfere with colonial rights. On a former occasion I expressed a doubt whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer was wise in taking the step which the right hon. Gentleman proposed, either with regard to foreign countries or the colonies, but when the colonists or their representatives say that this is an attempt to tax colonial property against their constitutional rights, they put forward a claim that cannot be fairly urged on this House. At the same time, I think it was unfortunate that when the right hon. Gentleman originally proposed to tax property situated in the colonies, the right hon. Gentleman himself should have urged, as one of the reasons why the proposal was justifiable, that the colonies did not contribute to Imperial Revenue.

SIR W. HARCOURT (who was almost inaudible) was understood to say that he was afraid he had expressed himself badly, and that his words had been misunderstood. It had not been his intention to state that as his ground for taxing the colonies.

MR. GOSCHEN: I have no wish to misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman or to put words into his mouth which would give the slightest offence, if spoken, to our colonial fellow-subjects. I am, however, afraid that the misinterpretation which has been put upon the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has aroused some feeling on the part of the colonists, and stimulated them to put forward the statement of their rights which they have put forward. I should hope that, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted, this is not at all a colonial question, but merely a question of taxing English property in the colonies; and, as the rights of the colonists are not invaded by the proposition in the view of the great majority of the House, under these circumstances, I think that the Committee may refrain from any further argument which would in any way relate to constitutional questions with the colonies. I put forward this view at the present stage believing that we all must be most anxious not to increase any passing ill-feeling or irritation which may exist in the minds of the colonists on this subject. Therefore, what we ought to do is to argue the matter simply on the ground of expediency. The Chancellor of the Exchequer does not hope to get much out of the tax, but thinks it necessary to avoid evasion. I, however, fail to see any more likelihood of evasion in the future than in the past, unless it be under the system of aggregation and graduation which has been adopted. I think that the right hon. Gentleman has shown a desire to meet the wishes of the Colonial Representatives. I do not desire to press the right hon. Gentleman, but I would remind him that he has not told the Committee to what extent he has succeeded in satisfying them. Colonists, I know from experience, are not always reasonable. The degree to which the colonists are satisfied with the proposals of the Government would, however, if stated, doubtless be a guide in forming an opinion as to the extent to which the proposals before the Committee should be pushed. If the Government can assure us that they have given not entire, but fair, satisfaction to the colonists in this matter, and after the concessions which have been made, I myself would be prepared to abstain from any further action in the matter.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he thought it was unfortunate that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have given his answer on such an important subject before he had heard all the arguments that might be advanced in its favour. The right hon. Gentleman had said he understood his new clause was accepted as a sufficient compromise by persons in the House who were authorised to speak for the colonists. He knew of no one who could speak with more authority for the colonists than the colonists themselves through their elected Representatives; and it was useless for gentlemen who went round the world in 40 days, or who spent a certain time in the other hemisphere, to think they could tell the Committee what the colonists said on this subject. What was the case for the tax? The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated it on the 31st of May, when he said—

“This is a proper tax to impose on property in foreign countries, and in the colonies. The colonies put a tax on our own commodities; and therefore, we are right to put this tax on them.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, failed to tell the House that this was an entirely new tax of a new kind. Hitherto they had followed property domiciled in this country when it was abroad to the extent of levying Legacy Duty, or in the case of settled personalty,

Mr. Goschen

Succession Duty. The true rule was the rule they had gone by in the past—namely, that they never attempted to levy any tax whatever upon any property whatever, except it was, either actually or constructively, within the United Kingdom. If a man were domiciled in the United Kingdom his personal property was constructively here; if his personalty were actually here, it was actually here, and it should be either actually or constructively here, to be taxed. Now a different rule was to be put in operation. Wherever the property of a man domiciled here was situated the Chancellor of the Exchequer claimed to levy a tax upon it. The right hon. Gentleman had talked of persons in the House who were authorised to speak for the colonists. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman of the objections of the colonists themselves to the tax. They declared, first of all, that Parliament had no constitutional right to impose this tax; that it would cause irritation, and seriously interfere with the field of taxation they regard constitutionally as their own; that it would seriously impede the free exchange of capital between the Mother Country and the colonies; and, finally, they submitted that if this duty was to be an enforced contribution from the colonists for the Navy, the colonists should have been in the first instance invited to contribute. He believed that if that invitation were given the colonists would not have refused to accede to it. Not one of the objections which he had quoted was met by the new clause of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That Memorial was written long before this clause was put down.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the declaration of the colonists was dated the 12th of June; it was seriously made, officially communicated to the House, and placed on the Table of the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward his clause to meet those objections, and told the Committee that there were persons in authority in the House who accepted it as sufficient. But what did the colonists themselves say? Had the right hon. Gentleman received any communication from the colonists since he had put his clause on the Paper, saying it had satisfied their objections? If not, then no one in the House was competent to say that the clause satisfied the colonists either completely or comparatively. It was impossible to read the declaration of the colonists without being struck by the close similarity it bore to another declaration made by colonists on an historical occasion. Lord Greville tried to induce the colonists of North America to submit to taxation by his Stamp Act, and said it was only a little one.

SIR W. HARCOURT: He claimed the right to tax the colonists.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, no doubt; but, as in this case, it was a Stamp Act imposing a Stamp Duty on certain documents in the colonies; and the contention was that it was a small matter, and only brought in £100,000. The tax was then altered into another tax of a different nature—a Customs Duty, which would bring in about £40,000, and it was still further reduced to a Tea Duty, which would probably have brought in £20,000; but it was enough to light a flame through the colonies. The objections of the colonists to that tax were identically the same as they were now. They said it was unconstitutional. That was denied. They said, "If you had asked us we would have made a contribution, but we will not submit to be taxed by the English Parliament." Then, as now, the objections of the colonists were denied; and he regretted that there were now no Chatham, or Burke, or Fox to enforce the objections.

SIR D. MACFARLANE (Argyll): Were those American colonists domiciled in this country?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he really did not know what the hon. Gentleman meant. He now came to the Amendment. It practically gave up aggregation. It admitted that they could not completely aggregate a property. It insisted rather on a new and separate aggregation being instituted. There was, first of all, the aggregation of the whole property, and then the aggregation of that part of it situated in the colonies; or having aggregated the whole property, they proposed to impose half the duty on half the property. That seemed to him to make the thing an absurdity. He observed also that the clause was based on reciprocity. That was to say, that on the one hand from duty levied here on property in Victoria they were to deduct the duty levied on the same property in Victoria; and, on the other hand, from duty levied in Victoria on property in Great Britain the duty levied on that property in Great Britain was to be deducted. But he did not see how that could be worked. The maximum duty in Victoria was 10 per cent.; here, under the Bill, it was 8 per cent., so that they would have to deduct 10 per cent. from 8 per cent. He would take the concrete case of a property worth £150,000. The duty here on that property would be 6 per cent., or £9,000; and in Victoria it would be 10 per cent., or £15,000. They would, therefore, under the clause, have to deduct £15,000 from £9,000, and how they were going to do it he failed to see. But the difficulty did not end there. The clause proposed that in consideration for deducting the duty levied here on property in Victoria, they were to deduct the duty levied in Victoria on property in the United Kingdom. But Victoria had never framed such a tax as a duty imposed on property in the United Kingdom. They were better informed in Victoria of the true principles of taxation than the modern professors of taxation in the United Kingdom. The clause, therefore, came to this: that because they gave up £9,000 they charged on property in Victoria, Victoria was to give up £9,000 she did not charge on property in the United Kingdom. But, probably, Victoria would not be long until she did make such a charge. Was it not manifest that Victoria would be forced, for the protection of her revenue, to levy on property in the United Kingdom passing at the death of a person domiciled in Victoria a duty equal to that levied in the United Kingdom on property in Victoria? Nay, she might do more. She might put on property in the United Kingdom a duty which would leave her something after the deduction provided by the clause was made. That would be a remarkable result of the Finance Bill. First of all, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would get nothing out of the duty levied on property in the colonies; but he would have provoked, and justly provoked, the colonies to levy an entirely new duty on property situated in this country. Coming to a more serious matter with regard to the clause, they had to consider the differentiation now proposed to be set up between British possessions and other foreign countries. He used the word "other" advisedly. God forbid that he should look on the colonies as foreign countries! but legally they were treated as such in all matters relating to domicile and taxation. This was shown by well-known decisions affecting India, Demerara, Sydney, and Jersey. The colonies in matters of legacy were as much foreign as Bordeaux and Paris. This being so, the Government were giving by this clause to one set of foreign countries what they withheld from others. In the case of Victoria they gave up £9,000 of duty out of £100,000, which they did not give up in France. This was an important matter, when they remembered that, as stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, foreign property that would come under the Bill, as compared with colonial property, was as two to one; so that it was proposed to favour one-third, and to give no favour to the other two-thirds. He would cite three Favoured-Nation Clauses which seemed to him to prohibit that. Take the cases of France, Germany, and Russia. In the Treaty with France of February 28, 1882, were contained the words—

"Each of the high contracting parties engages to give the other immediately and unconditionally the benefit of every favour, immunity, or privilege in matters of commerce or industry which have been, or may be conceded by one of the high contracting parties to any third nation"—

SIR W. HARCOURT: Hear, hear!

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the right hon. Gentleman cheered the word "nation," but that word was not generally adopted in clauses of this kind, and it had not the restricted meaning the right hon. Gentleman would put upon it. The clause said—

"any third nation whatsoever, whether within or beyond Europe."

Furthermore, it said—

"And likewise in all matters relating to the exercise of commerce and industry, and in respect to residence, whether temporary or permanent, the exercise of any calling or profession, the payment of taxes or other imposition, and the enjoyment of all legal rights and privileges, including the acquiring, holding, and power of disposing of property British subjects in France and in Algeria, and French in the United Kingdom, shall enjoy the treatment of the Most-Favoured Nation."

How was it with Germany? Practically the same thing, except that for the word "nation" the word "country" was used in the Treaty of May 30, 1865. Her Majesty's Government clearly, so far as Germany was concerned, in letting, say, Victoria off £9,000 in the case of £100,000, was making a great differentiation in favour of a "country." Take the Favoured-Nation Clause with Russia. There the word used was "foreigners." The clause of the Treaty of January 12, 1859, said—

Mr. Gibson Bowles

"The subjects of either of the two contracting parties in the dominions and possessions of the other shall be at full liberty to acquire, possess, and dispose of every description of property which the laws of the country may permit any foreigners of whatsoever nation, to acquire and possess. They may acquire and dispose of the same whether by purchase, sale, donation, exchange, marriage, testament, succession ab intestato, or in any other manner under the same conditions as are established by the laws of the country for all foreigners."

He maintained that the Government were setting up a differential treatment of the colonies, which, in the eye of the law, were foreign countries, and which, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had himself pointed out, imposed taxes on our commodities and treated us as foreigners. The Most-Favoured Nation Clauses precluded the Chancellor of the Exchequer from making any such differential treatment towards our colonists or the inhabitants of British possessions as was suggested in this clause—differential treatment which was denied to France, Germany, and Russia. Had the Government made any inquiry of the Governments of those countries as to whether they would regard it as an infraction of Treaties or not, or had they treated this matter as they did the strip of Congo territory the other day, when, having made their arrangements, they found out afterwards that the foreign nations would not agree to them, and then the Government had to back out? Were they sure that they would not have to give up this clause also? The matter was a serious one. He had shown that the Amendment was an inadequate alleviation, an ill-advised attempt to impose taxes beyond the scope of any which had hitherto been imposed or attempted to be imposed by this country. And what were they going to get by their policy? They would get absolutely nothing. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, "If you give me the power I will collect the duty," but he had already told them that in the case of property situated abroad where there was a foreign executor the British Exchequer might give up all hope of getting a farthing of duty. That concluded the whole question. It was quite certain that as soon as persons possessed of foreign property got wind of this taxation they would appoint foreign executors. The right hon. Gentleman expected to get the duty out of English executors, but it seemed to him (Mr. Gibson Bowles) that directly the effect of the Bill became known the Chancellor of the Exchequer might whistle for his duty. He would get nothing; or if he did receive duty it would be an extremely small amount, due to the carelessness of some solicitor or testator. Was it worth while, then, for the sake of a small gain to the Exchequer or no gain at all, to challenge the discontent of the colonies and raise serious questions with foreign nations? Would it not be better for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give up this claim at once and restrict his sphere of taxation to property actually or constructively situated in the United Kingdom, and to come back to the original principles of taxation? He regretted very much that they would have to discuss these Death Duties at any length in the House. His opinion was that they could only be successfully levied when they were kept secret—secret from everybody but the interested parties who had to pay them. Hitherto the public had been scarcely aware that Death Duties existed, but now that attention had been drawn to them people would cast about for a means to avoid them. Was it worth while, for the sake of a gain which would be so trifling, to imperil both the affection of the colonies and the friendship of foreign countries?

SIR W. HARCOURT was understood to say he had supposed that the hon. Member for Lynn Regis, from his Amendment on the Paper, adopted the principle of the clause, and that his only desire was to extend it to foreign countries. But what the hon. Member asked the Committee to do was not merely not to impose the new Death Duty, but to abandon the Death Duties which now existed. He (Sir W. Harcourt) was grateful to the right hon. Member for St. George's for the extremely moderate manner in which he had dealt with the question, showing how we were infringing no constitutional rights of the colonies in this matter, and that the question was really one of expediency. The hon. Member for Lynn Regis spoke with great confidence upon many subjects, and upon none more so than with regard to his interpretation of the Most-Favoured-Nation Clauses. He did not deny that the hon. Member was a great authority; but he (Sir W. Harcourt) preferred the authority of the responsible Law Advisers of the Crown, whose opinions were exactly opposite to those of the hon. Gentleman. It had never been regarded in connection with most-favoured treatment in Commercial Treaties that the colonies were included in the words "other nation" or "other country."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Is that view accepted by foreign countries?

SIR C. W. DILKE: Yes; by all.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: When a Treaty was made with a foreign nation it was not a Treaty with a colony, and when they spoke of the Most-Favoured Nation Clause they spoke of other nations with whom they made Treaties, and not the colonies. They did not make Treaties with the colonies, and, consequently, the whole foundation was knocked away from the argument of the hon. Member. He understood the hon. Member to wish to apply the doctrine of reciprocity exceptionally to foreign countries, but they were under no obligation to do so, and he saw no reason why they should do it. It would, in fact, entail a considerable loss of revenue to do this. The argument of the hon. Member would apply not merely to the new Estate Duty, but to all other duties. It should be remembered that they were not taxing the colonies or colonial property; they were taxing persons domiciled in England who had property in the colonies. It was true that personal property, wherever situated, followed the owner, and the State took the duty in respect of it from the executor to the extent of the assets under his control. There was nothing in the clause which invaded the rights of foreign States or of our colonies, and it was the desire of the Government to give to the colonies, in this reciprocal arrangement, an advantage they were not bound to give to other States, or even to the colonies unless they desired it. Under the circumstances, he hoped that this matter might not be made the cause of serious delay in arriving at a settlement of the question. The Government were desirous of acting in the most conciliatory manner towards the colonies. They had no desire to exercise arbitrary authority within their jurisdiction; all they proposed was merely to levy a tax on persons domiciled in the United Kingdom in respect of property belonging to them wheresoever situated.

MR. P. WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, they had no desire to prolong the discussion, but the stress the Chancellor of the Exchequer had laid on the point that the tax would be laid on the person domiciled in this country induced him (Mr. Williams) to place before the Committee a statement derived from the practical experience of a gentleman from South Australia. The hon. Member for Lynn Regis seemed to think that what the Government now proposed was an entirely new departure. He hardly thought that that was so, for when they came to bleeding it hardly mattered what amount of blood they took from the gentleman who underwent the operation.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, it was a new departure, because they were for the first time levying the Probate Duty outside the United Kingdom.

MR. P. WILLIAMS said, it was not a new departure in taxing property not within the four corners of the United Kingdom. He thought it was very likely that the amount of duty which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was proposing to levy would create some amount of feeling in the countries in which it was to be levied—a feeling which had not hitherto existed, because the amount of duty had been much smaller. The instance given to him was that of an Australian gentleman who died some years ago leaving property in Melbourne to the amount of £150,000, and £7,000 deposited in this country. He was domiciled here, having lived here for eight years previous to his death. Under the Bill these two properties would be aggregated. The testator disposed of the £150,000 secured on mortgage by two specific legacies, and then he left the sum of £4,000 to be paid out of the residue to a certain charity in Melbourne. His (Mr. P. Williams's) friend told him that under the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer it would have been absolutely impossible for the executors to have paid the legacy of £4,000. What his friend had said was that if the state of the case had been made public in Melbourne, and it was known that the inability of the testators' executors to pay over this sum of £4,000 was owing to the large amount which was required to be paid into the Exchequer of this country, there would have been many people who would have had a good deal to say on the matter.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he retained his opinion that the whole proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in this matter was inexpedient, both as regarded the colonies and foreign countries. The clause was not one which imposed taxation, but was one which remedied, to a certain extent, some of the inconveniences incident thereto. If they rejected the clause, they would fall back on a worse position than they were in originally. Therefore, he could not vote against the clause, which, though not going as far as he might wish, was, at all events, a modification of a worse condition of the law.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause read a second time.

THE CHAIRMAN called on Mr. Gibson Bowles to move an Amendment to the clause which stood on the Paper in his name.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: After the case has been given away by the right hon. Gentleman below me (Mr. Goschen) I will not move the Amendment.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, he should like to have a definition of the words "British possession" mentioned in the clause. There were so many kinds of possessions that he was not certain what was meant. The Transvaal suzerainty had been alluded to that afternoon. Then there was Cyprus, British protectorates, spheres of influence, and Chartered Companies. These were all types of British rights.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, it was difficult to give a definition of those words, but his idea was that they might be taken as generally as possible, and as including everything which we possessed. The question reminded him of the well-known definition that was once given of "archidiaconal functions." If it were necessary to make the words more expansive, he had no doubt it would be done. He was told that plain, ordinary, vulgar, English was not sufficient to interpret ordinary commonplace ideas, and that he must use the language of lawyers and draftsmen, which he always avoided as much as possible, because it made that obscure which without it would be very plain. He always endeavoured to avoid definitions of this kind. Therefore, without the leave of his hon. Friend, he would still say that a British possession was a British possession. That was, he thought, the first and last definition capable of being given to it. If further difficulties arose upon that they would try and put it straight if they could.

MR. GOSCHEN said, his hon. Friend the Member for Lynn Regis, who had not moved his Amendment, had avenged himself; but as the Amendment was not moved, he should not press the question of definition further. It was highly possible that upon Report it might be found necessary to argue the question with regard to foreign property, for he had always felt that it was undesirable that the free flow of capital to and fro between this and foreign countries should be interfered with. In France, for instance, equally high duties were imposed, and it would be impossible, therefore, for people to hold property in both countries.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) moved a new clause in reference to the mode of assessment of Income Tax, the object of which was to restore the law relating to Income Tax to its original form as proposed by Sir R. Peel, and to the form in which it stood down to the year 1865. It had always been felt to be a hardship that incomes arising from the exertions of a man's brain should be charged at as high a rate as those resulting from invested capital, and Motions to that effect had been moved over and over again. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, in his great Budget speech of 1853, said that in his judgment the Income Tax "bore, upon the whole, too hard upon intelligence and skill, and not enough upon property as compared with intelligence and skill."

The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies in his valuable work upon Finance and Politics, enumerating the objections to the Tax, said—

"The tax is professedly charged at the same rate on permanent as on precarious incomes, and thus its incidence is unequal, as between the workers of the world and those who toil not neither do they spin. A precarious income is taxed at an equal (and therefore at a proportionately heavier) rate as compared to the secure income. The objection to the present system of assessment is, that the tax is levied, in the case of precarious incomes, not only on income, but also partly on what is practically capital. The owner of a temporary income not derived from capital, and depending wholly or in part on his own health and life, is bound to save and invest a portion of his income, a necessity which cannot be said to exist in anything like the same degree in the case of a possessor of a permanent income derived from capital. . . . Neither the Income Tax, nor any other tax can be made perfect, nor its incidence absolutely fair and just. But le mieux est l'ennemi du bien; there is no reason because absolute justice cannot be done to everybody, that justice should be done to nobody. An injustice that cannot be redressed may yet be minimised. The demand made is not that individual incomes should be distinguished the one from the other, but that an endeavour should be made to distinguish on broad lines between that income which is permanent, i.e., derived from property, and that which is precarious in the sense that it depends upon the personal exertions of an individual."

Surely, then, he might claim his hon. Friend's vote. Again, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, speaking recently at Plymouth, said—

"When you consider the enormous inequality and injustice which is inflicted by taxing incomes irrespective of the source from which they are derived, when you see how the professional man and the business man who makes his income by his brains, and whose income is precarious and dependent upon his own life and health, and the continuance of his exertions, when you consider that his income is taxed upon the same basis and to the same extent as the income of a man who has inherited property, and who is the mere recipient, and contributes nothing, you must acknowledge that it is a serious and a great injustice."

In a recent article The Statist said very truly, June 2, 1894—

"At the present time the man who earns a precarious income at a profession or by a clerkship has to pay exactly the same rate of Income Tax as the man who receives an income which he has inherited from his parents, and for which he renders absolutely no service, and which he will be glad to hand down to his own children. Everybody is agreed that this is not a fair system."

No practical remedy, however, by any difference of rate had ever been suggested. There was an immense difference, no doubt, between the two classes of income, as regarded extreme cases, but they passed one into the other by imperceptible gradations. Nor had any satisfactory treatment of investments ever been suggested. Take one class: the securities of foreign nations. Some were excellent, others, unfortunately, as Investors knew to their cost, were almost valueless. The arrangement, however, made by Sir R. Peel gave a substantial relief to precarious incomes. Returns were made on an average of the income during the three preceding years, and if the amount fell short a rebate was given on the difference. Before the Committee of 1861 the head of the Inland Revenue Department gave evidence on this point, and estimated that this privilege was equivalent to a concession to industrial revenue of something like 30 per cent. It had, moreover, the advantage that it increased of course with the uncertainty. But in 1865 this advantage, and so far as he was aware—without any notice being given to those concerned or to the House of Commons—was considerably modified, and, instead of a rebate being given of the whole, the Income Tax-payer was now only allowed to bring in the current year, instead of the first one of the three. Supposing, for instance, that a lawyer or a medical man, or a man of business, had made for three years £1,000 a year. He would add the three years together, and, dividing the amount given by three, his average income would, of course, be £1,000, which he would return to the Income Tax officials. Now, supposing that, from any breakdown of his health, or from any change in the course of trade, he made actually no income, or even a loss. Under the old system he could claim the rebate. He could say, "I have paid Income Tax on £1,000, and, as a matter of fact, I have made nothing," and he was entitled to receive back his Income Tax. That certainly seemed only fair. But under the present system all he was entitled to do was to strike off the first of the three years—that was to say, to strike off £1,000 from the £3,000, and then add the profit for the current year (which in the case proposed would be nothing) to the £2,000 remaining. The £2,000 would then be divided by three, giving an average of £666 13s. 4d., and on this amount he would be liable to pay. Under the old system he would get his rebate on the whole £1,000; under the present one only on £333 6s. 8d., and would have to pay on £666 of profit which he had never made. The change was unjust, and an effort should be made this year to induce Parliament and the Government to revert to the old system, which, it was evident, would be only fair, and a great boon to all those whose income depended upon their own exertions, whether in law, medicine, or commerce. The change made in 1865 deprived those whose income depended on their own exertions, and were therefore necessarily somewhat precarious, of a compensation which they long enjoyed, and left them in many cases under a legal obligation to pay Income Tax on a non-existent income. The present plan gave an advantage to the rising man, to Nature's darling, the strongest, whose income was increasing, and who did not need it; on the other hand, it pressed unjustly on the man whose health was giving way, or whose business was doing badly, just in fact, when, if possible, he ought to be relieved. The rising and successful man was assessed on less than his income; the one whose income was falling was made to pay on more than his income. The Chancellor of the Exchequer during these discussions had referred more than once to the story of Sir T. Meryweather, who, after retiring from business, was said to have observed that he "had lost many cases which he ought to have won, but on the other hand he had won many cases which he ought to have lost, and so justice was done." The story was generally told as an example of false logic, but the Chancellor had used it as a real argument for his Bill. As matters now stood, many of those who lived by their own exertions were called on to pay on income they had never received. It was no answer to say that another man had enjoyed an income on which he had not paid. The proposal, therefore, was that no man should any longer be charged on more than he earned. The effect of this clause would be that we should revert to the old system; if we did so we should do something to redress a great and admitted grievance, and he begged therefore to commend the clause to the favourable consideration of the Committee and to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

New Clause—

(Commissioners may amend assessment in certain cases.)

"And be it enacted that, if within or at the end of the year current at the time of making any assessment under this Act, or at the end of any year when such assessment ought to have been made, any person charged to the duties charged in Schedule D on an assessment computed on the average of the three preceding years shall find and prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioners by whom the assessment was made that his profits and gains during such year fell short of the sum so computed, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners to cause the assessment to be amended accordingly and the sum so overpaid to be refunded."—(Sir J. Lubbock.)

Sir J. Lubbock

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT said that, in moving this Amendment, which might be disposed of very easily, his right hon. Friend had urged the desirability of returning to the system that existed prior to the passing of the Act of 1865. He seemed to have overlooked the fact that the alteration effected by that Act, which he now wished to overthrow, was introduced at the express instance of Mr. Hubbard, who was a strong advocate for lightening the burden of the Income Tax wherever practicable. Taking the average of a man's income for the last three years was a plan specially devised to meet the difficulty in the way of appealing that would be experienced by business and professional men. He was quite willing to allow that system to continue, as he believed that it was, on the whole, fair to both parties. The proposal of his right hon. Friend, while adhering to the form of making a Return upon the average, did not in fact carry out that principle at all, for the first year was only to be struck out where the fourth year showed a loss. Surely, therefore, if the Revenue was to collect only on the small profits or receipts, the principle of average ceased at once. For this reason he did not feel justified in accepting the Amendment. If his right hon. Friend would consider the question of average he would see the absurdity of this proposal and that it was utterly irreconcilable with any principle of sound taxation.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) expressed his disappointment at the speech just delivered, and regretted that the right hon. Gentleman would not accept the Amendment, which he considered to be most reasonable. The present system of taking the average of a man's income was bad, and had the effect of making anyone in difficulties go down the hill all the faster. It might be perfectly true that under it the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not get more than a fair total in the year, but it was absurd to contend that there was any ground of justice in saying that, because one man had paid too little, another should not complain because he had had to pay too much.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is the average that is paid upon.

MR. BARTLEY said, the plan worked unfairly, and it would be much fairer—if it could be carried out—that people should pay on each year's income. No doubt when Mr. Hubbard's proposal was accepted it was believed that it would work fairly. After several years' trial, however, that was found not to be the case, and he was prepared to say that there was a strong and growing feeling in the country that it should be altered. A man, let it be supposed, made £20,000 profit in his business one year, £12,000 profit the next, and a loss of £10,000 in the third year. Instead of paying upon his £22,000 income, he must pay on £43,300. It was useless for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that some more fortunate person had gone in the other direction, and that so the account was balanced. This was a most reasonable proposal. They had found from experience that this was not a new question. There was a feeling growing up in the country that the mode of assessment to the Income Tax was not fair; and even if this Amendment were not accepted, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would agree to a system of yearly averages, which would not fall quite so hardly on those whose business was falling. Indeed, he thought it would be an infinitely fairer system. Income Tax ought to be a tax upon income; many people did not pay upon their real income, and the fact that some people evaded part of their obligation was no reason why those who were honest should be overtaxed.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 125 ; Noes 177.—(Division List, No. 144.)

THE CHAIRMAN: The next clause on the Paper—that as to "variations in Estate Duty," standing in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for the Holderness Division of Yorkshire—is out of Order.

*MR. BYRNE (Essex, Walthamstow) said, he wished to move a new clause in reference to works of art. As it was of considerable length he would not trouble the Committee by reading it, but would explain briefly that its object was to pro-works of art on the market would be that the foreign competitor would come into the market more than ever before, and the works would find their way to other countries not blessed with a Chancellor of the Exchequer so extremely anxious to mulct capital value after the death of the owner. Hitherto America had not been a very great mart for these works of art; but when they reflected how much money Americans had to spend and how little they had to spend he could not doubt that the fashion might soon set in of spending it on furniture and china, and when it did there would be competition on this side such as no English and no French fortune would be able to withstand. They would be better off in the future if they left the permanent possessions of works of art in the same position as at present. Let them look at the matter from another point of view. The proposal was recommended to them by its authors and supporters on the ground, with regard to all kinds of taxation, that there should be an equality of sacrifice. But that was not the case here. A man was to be taxed for a thing which brought him no revenue whatever, real or imaginary, and which he perhaps valued only because it belonged to his ancestors—say a family Reynolds or Gainsborough—that was not exacting an equality of sacrifice. Turning again from the case of individual hardship to that of public expediency, was it not inevitable that the result would be, except in the very rare cases of men of exceptional wealth, to break up these collections on the death of their present possessors? Did anybody doubt that these private collections were items of national wealth? He never heard of any great historic collection not being open to the public. They were sent to public loan collections or were open to inspection by the public at the houses of the owners. Were not the Government, then, impoverishing their country by imposing a tax which, he contended, must lead to the sale of these collections—collections of pleasure, instruction, and enlightenment? Could not the Chancellor of the Exchequer do something for these vast collections of non-income-bearing property? All that he learned that the scheme of his hon. and right hon. Friend was worthy of consideration, he would be prepared to go into the

with him. He would, however, appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he could not accept the scheme of his hon. Friend, whether he could not himself propose some other scheme; whether he would not raise himself to the height of the interests involved and remember that he was responsible not merely for the Exchequer, but for all the interests of the country, and amongst them the preservation of these great collections of art treasures which, if they chose to be careless of them, other nations wiser in their generation than we would draw from us under conditions which would exclude the possibility of their ever returning to our possession.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he acknowledged the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman, but he did not regard this as a question of taxation, and if he thought that the proposals of the Government were going to have the result which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think, he certainly would endeavour to devise some means of avoiding such a great danger. He did not, however, entertain any apprehension of that sort. The argument that was directed to non-payment in respect of property that did not yield income was a very difficult one to deal with. America had, or professed to have, a Property Tax which would be payable, he supposed, every year, and not merely upon the death of the owner. He disputed the unfounded alarm, and did not believe in the social convulsions put forward by the Opposition. He recognised entirely the great liberality of the owners of these art collections; but he could not accept the Amendment for the reasons he had stated. The right hon. Gentleman said that all of these collections were shown. He believed the exceptions were rare, but he knew some very remarkable ones. There was one for which the country paid an enormous sum, he thought an inordinate sum, which no man was allowed to see. There were in it manuscripts of great value to which access for literary purposes was absolutely refused. He still adhered to his belief that the changes likely to be made were not so great as the right hon. Gentleman anticipated, and that the wealth of England could always demand for this country the best works of art in this country and abroad.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he hoped when the Chancellor of the Exchequer commenced his speech that he was intending to find some means by which he could carry out their recommendations. There was no doubt that if the right hon. Gentleman really wished to carry out the object the clause had in view he could find some system by which to do it. He might find some way of doing it if he turned his attention to legislation in France. In France they treated personality in two ways—that which yielded income and that which did not. It was clear that a distinction could be drawn between the two kinds. That was a suggestion he would throw out to the right hon. Gentleman, though he was afraid he was not in sympathy with the Amendment. From the beginning the right hon. Gentleman had never really seen the magnitude of his own proposals. He could not and would not realise that moderate duties had not the same effect as extremely high duties. Human nature was human nature, and if the duty was doubled its effect was doubled. He was sure that the arguments of his right hon. Friend would have considerable weight with the public at large. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was sometimes wise to disperse collections; but often the great beauty of a collection was that it was made up of pictures of a particular school, whose value depended on them as a collection. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would yet be able to form some reasonable plan before the Report stage. It would not interfere with the principle of his Budget, and would not, he thought, meet with much opposition from his own side of the House.

*SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle) said, the terms of the proposal were very wide indeed. It was left to the Commissioners at Somerset House to say what were and what were not works of art, and they were asked to be judges also on books and historical manuscripts. It always seemed to him that pictures were more liable to be dispersed by gambling, dissipation, and speculation than by such duties as were proposed to be levied. Much as he loved pictures, he must say that he foresaw tremendous difficulties if this exemption should be adopted. As a fact, he was opposed to exemptions or limitations of any kind. He objected that his constituents should be taxed extra in order that somebody else might see a collection of pictures which was only to be seen in a private house. This seemed to him one of those exceptions the Committee could not possibly carry.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said, he wished the right hon. Gentleman could realise the enormous uncertainty which must rest on the value of art treasures. He knew a house where there were great historical manuscripts, and he did not think any human being could say at what point the valuer ought to put their value; and if the uncertainty of value were combined with the principle of aggregation, there was no limit to the amount which might be charged in respect of art treasures. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to think that all the successor had to do was to sell some of these art treasures in order to pay the duty. That, of course, was exactly the thing which they desired to prevent. It was possible for a man to succeed to a great gallery of pictures, and very little personality with it. Everyone of the pictures might be an heirloom which he would be unable to sell, and yet he would have to pay an aggregated duty on the works of art. He had no doubt that in extreme cases the Court would give some kind of relief when appealed to. In many cases, however, great hardship would be inflicted, and the person accountable would find difficulty in raising sufficient money to pay the duty on the works of art which by law he was not able to sell. Again, in many cases the possession of art treasures was not only no pecuniary benefit but a great expense. They were thrown open to the public. Custodians had to be engaged and a great deal had to be spent in connection with wear and tear, but this would not be taken into account by the Inland Revenue Department, who would insist upon payment being made on the full value. The successor might be anxious to sell, but, as he had said, would not be able to. That would be a rare case. In the majority of instances the possessor would not desire to sell, but would take legitimate pride in these works of art. It would be admitted that it would be a serious public disadvantage if the owners of these great collections were encouraged to part with them. It had been sufficiently urged that they might pass to works of art on the market would be that the foreign competitor would come into the market more than ever before, and the works would find their way to other countries not blessed with a Chancellor of the Exchequer so extremely anxious to mulct capital value after the death of the owner. Hitherto America had not been a very great mart for these works of art; but when they reflected how much money Americans had to spend and how little they had to spend he could not doubt that the fashion might soon set in of spending it on furniture and china, and when it did there would be competition on this side such as no English and no French fortune would be able to withstand. They would be better off in the future if they left the permanent possessions of works of art in the same position as at present. Let them look at the matter from another point of view. The proposal was recommended to them by its authors and supporters on the ground, with regard to all kinds of taxation, that there should be an equality of sacrifice. But that was not the case here. A man was to be taxed for a thing which brought him no revenue whatever, real or imaginary, and which he perhaps valued only because it belonged to his ancestors—say a family Reynolds or Gainsborough—that was not exacting an equality of sacrifice. Turning again from the case of individual hardship to that of public expediency, was it not inevitable that the result would be, except in the very rare cases of men of exceptional wealth, to break up these collections on the death of their present possessors? Did anybody doubt that these private collections were items of national wealth? He never heard of any great historic collection not being open to the public. They were sent to public loan collections or were open to inspection by the public at the houses of the owners. Were not the Government, then, impoverishing their country by imposing a tax which, he contended, must lead to the sale of these collections—collections which were open to the public for their pleasure, instruction, and enlightenment? Could not the Chancellor of the Exchequer do something for these vast collections of non-income-bearing property? Believing that the scheme of his hon. and learned Friend was worthy of consideration, he would be prepared to go into the Lobby

with him. He would, however, appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he could not accept the scheme of his hon. Friend, whether he could not himself propose some other scheme; whether he would not raise himself to the height of the interests involved and remember that he was responsible not merely for the Exchequer, but for all the interests of the country, and amongst them the preservation of these great collections of art treasures which, if they chose to be careless of them, other nations wiser in their generation than we would draw from us under conditions which would exclude the possibility of their ever returning to our possession.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he acknowledged the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman, but he did not regard this as a question of taxation, and if he thought that the proposals of the Government were going to have the result which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think, he certainly would endeavour to devise some means of avoiding such a great danger. He did not, however, entertain any apprehension of that sort. The argument that was directed to non-payment in respect of property that did not yield income was a very difficult one to deal with. America had, or professed to have, a Property Tax which would be payable, he supposed, every year, and not merely upon the death of the owner. He disputed the unfounded alarm, and did not believe in the social convulsions put forward by the Opposition. He recognised entirely the great liberality of the owners of these art collections; but he could not accept the Amendment for the reasons he had stated. The right hon. Gentleman said that all of these collections were shown. He believed the exceptions were rare, but he knew some very remarkable ones. There was one for which the country paid an enormous sum, he thought an inordinate sum, which no man was allowed to see. There were in it manuscripts of great value to which access for literary purposes was absolutely refused. He still adhered to his belief that the changes likely to be made were not so great as the right hon. Gentleman anticipated, and that the wealth of England could always demand for this country the best works of art in this country and abroad.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he hoped when the Chancellor of the Exchequer commenced his speech that he was intending to find some means by which he could carry out their recommendations. There was no doubt that if the right hon. Gentleman really wished to carry out the object the clause had in view he could find some system by which to do it. He might find some way of doing it if he turned his attention to legislation in France. In France they treated personality in two ways—that which yielded income and that which did not. It was clear that a distinction could be drawn between the two kinds. That was a suggestion he would throw out to the right hon. Gentleman, though he was afraid he was not in sympathy with the Amendment. From the beginning the right hon. Gentleman had never really seen the magnitude of his own proposals. He could not and would not realise that moderate duties had not the same effect as extremely high duties. Human nature was human nature, and if the duty was doubled its effect was doubled. He was sure that the arguments of his right hon. Friend would have considerable weight with the public at large. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was sometimes wise to disperse collections; but often the great beauty of a collection was that it was made up of pictures of a particular school, whose value depended on them as a collection. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would yet be able to form some reasonable plan before the Report stage. It would not interfere with the principle of his Budget, and would not, he thought, meet with much opposition from his own side of the House.

*SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle) said, the terms of the proposal were very wide indeed. It was left to the Commissioners at Somerset House to say what were and what were not works of art, and they were asked to be judges also on books and historical manuscripts. It always seemed to him that pictures were more liable to be dispersed by gambling, dissipation, and speculation than by such duties as were proposed to be levied. Much as he loved pictures, he must say that he foresaw tremendous difficulties if this exemption should be adopted. As a fact, he was opposed to exemptions or limitations of any kind. He objected that his constituents should be taxed extra in order that somebody else might see a collection of pictures which was only to be seen in a private house. This seemed to him one of those exceptions the Committee could not possibly carry.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said, he wished the right hon. Gentleman could realise the enormous uncertainty which must rest on the value of art treasures. He knew a house where there were great historical manuscripts, and he did not think any human being could say at what point the valuer ought to put their value; and if the uncertainty of value were combined with the principle of aggregation, there was no limit to the amount which might be charged in respect of art treasures. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to think that all the successor had to do was to sell some of these art treasures in order to pay the duty. That, of course, was exactly the thing which they desired to prevent. It was possible for a man to succeed to a great gallery of pictures, and very little personality with it. Everyone of the pictures might be an heirloom which he would be unable to sell, and yet he would have to pay an aggregated duty on the works of art. He had no doubt that in extreme cases the Court would give some kind of relief when appealed to. In many cases, however, great hardship would be inflicted, and the person accountable would find difficulty in raising sufficient money to pay the duty on the works of art which by law he was not able to sell. Again, in many cases the possession of art treasures was not only no pecuniary benefit but a great expense. They were thrown open to the public. Custodians had to be engaged and a great deal had to be spent in connection with wear and tear, but this would not be taken into account by the Inland Revenue Department, who would insist upon payment being made on the full value. The successor might be anxious to sell, but, as he had said, would not be able to. That would be a rare case. In the majority of instances the possessor would not desire to sell, but would take legitimate pride in these works of art. It would be admitted that it would be a serious public disadvantage if the owners of these great collections were encouraged to part with them. It had been sufficiently urged that they might pass to foreign buyers. Not only that, but they might be dispersed, and that, by itself, would be a great public loss. In many cases the collections, without the house in which they were, would lose a large part of their value. They were very often—especially in the case of manuscripts—connected with some particular house or some particular name, or reign, or family, and to disperse them all over the face of the country would largely diminish their value. There were museums kept by private individuals for the benefit of the public, and so long as they found private owners who did their duty to the public, allowing them to have the benefit of their collections—allowing their pictures to be seen, and their historical treasures they possessed to be made use of by those who could profit by them, whether as representing the Government or as members of learned Institutions—care should be taken to avoid injuring these collections. These owners were public servants in the highest sense of the term, and he thought that the right hon. Gentleman would be well advised if he could find some means by which the possessor of these treasures and the performance of this great public duty would be saved from what would be almost a prohibitive fine.

*MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) said, that the hon. Baronet had stated that when sales of these art treasures had taken place it was almost always due to reckless living. Well, he thought that hereafter the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would find that the sales were rendered necessary not by reckless living, but by natural death. When the right hon. Gentleman told them that he did not share the apprehensions of hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House he surely did not, on this Budget, expect them to be content with his ipse dixit, in regard to which he was not armed with the usual invaluable evidence of the Inland Revenue Office. No Chancellor of the Exchequer had ever before tried to impose this tax on works of art, therefore there were no data to go upon except the predictions of hon. Members. The sale of these works of art would cause their dispersal, yet they had no pecuniary value until they were sold. The State had a right to levy a duty of 10 per cent. when the owner converted the art treasures into cash, but, as the Leader of the Opposition had pointed out, so long as the owner did not do that and did not draw a farthing of income from them, there was no property or estate on which the Government had a right to levy taxation, because there was no basis upon which to estimate the value. He (Mr. Cohen) did earnestly entreat the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the interest of preserving for the country the splendid collections which were amassed in it to endeavour, on the Report stage, to give effect to the ideas for which he had professed so much sympathy.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 60 ; Noes 120.—(Division List, No. 145.)

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE said, he ventured to move the following Amendment on behalf of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for York (Mr. Butcher):—

After Clause 4, to insert the following Clause :—

(Power of Court to vary settlements.)

"Any person entitled to an interest in settled property in respect of which Estate Duty has not already been paid may apply to the High Court in the manner directed by Rules of Court to have it determined, and the Court may thereupon determine whether and if so how the payment of such duty should be provided for, and may make such variations and additions in and to the trusts and powers contained in the instrument settling the property as may be necessary for carrying such determination into effect."

He said, the Amendment touched one of the hardest cases under this extraordinary Budget. It touched the great question of the settlements which had been made before the passing of the Act, and which would be seriously affected by its provisions. As a matter of simple justice they ought to have been allowed to have broken settlements which had been made before the passing of the Act, for the purpose of having a free hand, but that, owing to the way in which the Government had drawn the Bill, was out of Order. It might be taken as perfectly certain that if the settlers had known the enormous burden which was going to be thrown upon the inheritance, in consequence of the provisions of the Bill, they would probably have settled in a very different manner, or not at all. The case, which he was not at present dealing with, of the succession of an heir who was not a lineal was most seriously affected by this Budget. He would have to pay a very large sum of money—so large, indeed, that he was quite sure, if the settlor had known it, he would not have settled the property in such a way. This particular Amendment did not propose to break settlements, which would have been out of Order, but it did propose to give the Committee power to vary the method by which the duty was to be paid, in order that substantial justice might be done. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would remember that this Amendment did not in any way propose to diminish the Revenue. What the Chancery Court called justice would be carefully safeguarded by it. What they wished to do was to give power to the Court to vary the settlement so that justice might be done between the various beneficiaries. He would divide his example into two classes, the first dealing with the question of non-productive personalty with which they dealt in the last Amendment. They might have a case in which an heir succeeded to a large picture gallery, and to a very small sum of money, and he might find it very hard or absolutely impossible to find the Estate Duty upon the pictures when he succeeded. He might be forbidden to sell the pictures. The Court of Chancery, under the Settled Land Act, had taken great powers upon itself to dispense with that: but in any case the exercise of the power was very limited, and they desired to allow the Court, in a case of that kind, a perfectly free hand to permit a person under such circumstances to sell the pictures, or some of them. A second class of cases was where it was quite evident to the Court and everybody else that unless there was some readjustment of the burthen of the Estate Duty as between the beneficiaries very great injustice would be done. He would give one or two instances to illustrate his meaning. It was a very common thing, where a rich man had an estate partly real and partly personal, to leave the real property, with a sum of personalty, to the eldest son, and the personal estate, or the great bulk of it, to his youngest son. That was a very common disposition. The eldest son might find that the duty had increased upon the estate out of all proportion to what its settlor anticipated, and that, therefore, he had no money whatever with which to manage his property. He would then be placed in a very great difficulty. It was quite evident that what the settlor intended would be that the elder son should have the real property and as much money as was necessary to manage the property, and that the younger son should have the rest. He would take, next, the case of a man dying, having settled the bulk of his property upon the eldest son in the ordinary way. The deceased, however, might have left a comparatively small sum of money—say £10,000—to his wife for her life, and to his unmarried daughter afterwards for her life, after the death of the mother. That would be a reasonable disposition. The testator would carefully adjust the sum of money so that there should be what was comfortable for his daughter. Then entered the Chancellor of the Exchequer with his Budget and aggregation proposals and all the rest of it. The daughter would have to pay, of course, upon the scale of duty of the whole of the estate left by the settlor. Suppose £1,000,000 had been left, then the £10,000 left to the husband of the daughter when she succeeded to it would have to pay upon the highest scale. Instead of having a comfortable provision, the case was perfectly conceivable where a daughter might be put in anything but a comfortable position owing to the fact that the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had completely altered the conditions of the settlement after it was made and after the settlor was dead, and it was absolutely impossible in any way to remedy the injustice committed. In such a case as he had referred to it was perfectly evident that the intention of the settlor was to leave a comfortable portion for his daughter, to be carved out of the estate of the eldest son. In a case of that kind there ought to be some authority which might say that this was the obvious intention of the settlor, that the whole of the Estate Duty ought to be paid by the son on his own £1,000,000 and the £10,000 as well. The intention of the settlor was that his daughter should be comfortably off, and should have what he thought was a proper provision for her, and that intention ought not to be rendered nugatory by the intervention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer after the settlor was dead. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would lose nothing, and the only question was as to who should pay the duty?

In such a case it was the son, the settlor intending that his daughter should have this sum of money undiminished by the payment of duty. There ought to be some authority enabled to do substantial justice in a case of that kind, and he proposed a perfectly impartial authority—namely, the High Court. He had great regard for the sanctity of settlements which had been made upon certain considerations, and under which a man thought he had provided for those near and dear to him. He thought that ought to be respected, and but for the circumstances under which they lived he should not have suggested that even such an impartial authority as the High Court should interfere. As, however, the proposals of the Budget would throw the whole balance of things out, and make what would otherwise be a comfortable settlement an uncomfortable one, he thought that the High Court, which was the only impartial tribunal they had, should be able to readjust the payment of the Estate Duty so that no injustice should be done.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. R. T. REID, Dumfries, &c.) said, the noble Lord had stated that this was not an Amendment to vary settlements, as any attempt to so vary them would be out of Order in any Amendment. But the noble Lord's argument was an appeal to give power to do that very thing. He gave an illustration of a man who possessed £1,000,000 and who left a sum of £10,000 to his daughter, and thereupon the daughter would, by reason of aggregation and graduation, have to pay a larger sum of money in duty than she would have to pay had her father been a poorer man, and the argument of the noble Lord was that if the settlor could have anticipated there would have been a Chancellor of the Exchequer of this description he would have made a different settlement. The noble Lord, therefore, desired that some Court should have the power to readjust the settlement—in fact, to break it, and make a new provision which he considered that the settlor ought to have made.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Not that the settlor ought to have made that which he did make, but which the Chancellor of the Exchequer upset.

MR. R. T. REID: Well, what was the settlor's unexpressed purpose?

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: No, his expressed purpose.

MR. R. T. REID said, that was nothing more nor less than breaking the settlement. He would take the extreme case the noble Lord had put, and although he thought it would be a hard case to that extent, what would be the precise difference between the position of the daughter who was left £10,000 when her father was a millionaire and when he was a man of moderate means, possessing, say, £40,000 or £50,000? The extreme difference between £50,000 and £1,000,000 would be 3 per cent., or £300, and although it was not pleasant for anybody to pay £300 it was impossible to describe the payment of this £300 as the grievous hardship which the noble Lord had represented it to be. He thought this was a proof of the exaggerated apprehensions which the hon. Gentleman entertained—

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: Of course, the figure of £10,000 was merely an illustration. It might be a smaller sum, and the difference then would be greater.

MR. R. T. REID observed that he was aware the figure was given by way of illustration, but if any other illustration had been given it would be open to a similar criticism. He thought it would be a serious thing to give a Court power to break any settlement, and, as a matter of fact, the clause was unnecessary, because by Section 14 of the Bill as it had been reprinted they had enabled the person who paid the duty upon settled property which did not pass to recover in proportion on the charges or encumbrances upon the property in the nature of portions or jointures; and it was provided, in case the parties did not arrange as to the proper proportion of Estate Duty payable by each, the Court should have the power to allot. With that power there was no danger of any wrong or injustice being done. The noble Lord said that the Court should determine whether the payment of duty was provided, and, secondly, how the payment of duty should be provided. He was not aware that the High Court was more competent than anybody else to say the duty should be provided for and how it should be. He believed that men of sense, heads of families, were quite as competent as a Court of Justice to say what ought to be done, unless, indeed, they gave the Court power to vary the settlements, and it would be out of Order to propose to do so after the Speaker's ruling. He hoped the clause would not be pressed.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, that when he endeavoured to move an Instruction giving power to break settlements the Speaker ruled it out of Order, saying that it was impossible under this Bill to give power to break settlements. The Chairman had ruled this Amendment to be in Order, and the Solicitor General said that it was nothing more nor less than breaking settlements, so that the main part of the hon. and learned Gentleman's contention was more against the Chairman's decision than against the argument of the noble Lord. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that in the illustration given by the noble Lord the amount that would have to be paid would only be £300. Yes; but if that money was settled it would not be liable to Probate Duty at all now; but under the future arrangement it would pay 8 per cent.—that was, £800.

MR. R. T. REID: I put the case of a man possessing £40,000 or £50,000 instead of being a millionaire. If it was £50,000 it would pay now 4 per cent.

MR. GRANT LAWSON: But it would not pay under settlement.

*THE CHAIRMAN: In reference to what the hon. and learned Member for Thirsk has said, I wish to point out that there is no difference whatever between the Speaker's ruling and my own; indeed, I submitted this ruling to the Speaker before I gave it. As I understand the Amendment, it is only to give power to the Court to say how the duty shall be paid.

MR. GRANT LAWSON: My point was that the Solicitor General said this was an Amendment to break settlements.

MR. R. T. REID dissented from this view.

MR. GRANT LAWSON said, that then he entirely misunderstood the hon. and learned Gentleman, and he would not pursue that topic further. This Amendment appeared to him to meet a very practical point. It was only in the cases where they satisfied the High Court that an injustice had been done that there would be any alteration in the settlement, and the alteration would then only extend to the determination of the question as to how the duty was to be paid.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. BARTLEY moved the following Clause:—

(Value of an estate in Ireland.)

"In calculating the principal value of a deceased tenant's estate in Ireland, the price which such tenant has paid for the tenant right, or, if the deceased has not purchased the tenant right, the price which the tenant right of similar holdings realise in the district shall be the principal value of such tenant right. Provided always, that the maximum principal value of such tenant right shall not exceed 12 and a half times the amount of rent paid for the holding."

He said, the subject of tenant right in Ireland was a matter which ought to have serious consideration, and ought to be clearly defined in the Bill. Tenant right in Ireland was a very substantial property, and one which, he believed, under the present law, came under the duty as personalty. Of course, it would be very much altered by this Bill, inasmuch as aggregation would come into force, and this duty would be very much enlarged in certain estates. The clause he had to move was that there should be a distinct statement that the tenant right was a duty to be taxed under this Bill, and that there should be a limit put upon it as provided in the clause. It had been held that tenant right was a saleable article. It was perfectly true it was not always sold. The property, however, was there, and when he moved an Amendment on the subject of reversions, he had a most emphatic statement from the Solicitor General that it was the intention of the Government not only to tax persons who derived benefit from the property, but also those who had property which they could at any moment sell if they thought proper to do so. As he had said, the tenant right in Ireland was a saleable commodity, and in many instances had been sold at a very high price indeed—very often at a higher figure than the freehold itself was worth. It was, therefore, very clear that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer was throwing his net to catch all available subjects of taxation, he ought to include tenant rights. On the other hand, he thought it would not be fair to tax the tenant rights to the absolute amount at which the land hunger sometimes demanded that they should be sold at, and he had fixed the maximum value at $12\frac{1}{2}$ years' purchase. If the tenant rights were taxed to the moderate extent he had suggested it would mean they would derive from this source something like £70,000 a year, and if they were going to tax unfortunate persons who were left with an annuity of £25 a year and upwards, it seemed to him they were bound to tax those tenants in Ireland who had tenancies exceeding £50 a year. Although it was quite true that these tenant rights must have been taxed to a certain extent in the past as personalty, still he thought no one realised how very much his proposal would increase the revenue to the Exchequer. He considered that by the limit he had imposed, to the effect that no one should pay more than $12\frac{1}{2}$ years' purchase, no injustice would be done, and Ireland would have the gratification of subscribing her due quota for this property. If there was a strong case for taxation it was that which related to the Irish tenant right, because under the first Land Act there was no doubt the tenant right was given to the Irish tenant. There was no question that he had a moral claim to a great deal of it; still, it was given to him entirely, and he had no idea that such a concession would be made to him. Inasmuch as the property had been given to the tenant, it seemed reasonable they should require that its full share of taxation should be paid, due precautions being taken to prevent any injustice being done.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I understand the hon. Member has moved this in the interests of the Irish tenant. I have always understood from those who are the natural Representatives of the Irish tenants that they do not approve of this clause, and, though it is to their advantage, under these circumstances I cannot accept it.

Mr. HANBURY said, that was all very fine, but it was not very satisfactory; and he did not think they should be put off in this way by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Were they to understand that the Chancellor of the Exchequer considered one kind of justice was to be meted out to the English tenants and another kind to the Irish tenants? They had heard all through these Debates that everything which was of value passing in death was to be taxed, and now directly the purse of the principal supporters of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was attacked the right hon. Gentleman threw over the whole of his high principle altogether and said, "No, I dare not even mention the subject to the House." The Chancellor of the Exchequer declined to give an answer. The right hon. Gentleman had practically said, "I have put the matter to my masters at the other side of the House, and they do not want this tax." But the right hon. Gentleman had got to convince the Committee that he was going to deal out equal justice between the rich and the poor, between Englishmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen alike. He had got to show the Committee that the tenant right of the Irish tenants had no taxable value, and therefore was not liable to taxation. But the Committee knew very well what large prices were given for tenant right in Ireland, and the right hon. Gentleman would find it difficult to prove that no tax should be placed upon it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The speech of the hon. Member shows that he has not the remotest idea of what he is talking about. The fact is, that the tenant right is taxed, and the proposal of the hon. Member is for a relaxation of the taxation. The hon. Member for Preston imagines that I have opposed this proposal at the instigation of the Irish Members. Well, after all, they know something about the interests of the tenants of Ireland; they know that the tenant right is taxed, and they say that the Irish tenants are satisfied with the Bill as it stands.

*MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) said, he did not think the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was sufficient. He was on a Committee that was discussing this matter upstairs, and he therefore knew something about it. The question he would like to have answered by the right hon. Gentleman was whether there was or was not a charge by way of Death Duty for the interest of tenants in Ireland whether they sold their holdings or not? If such a charge was imposed he would like to know what valuation was accepted as the basis of the charge—whether it was the valuation fixed by the Sub-Commissioners or the open market valuation? He did not profess to decide what should be the basis of the valuation, for the very good reason that no Sub-Commissioner who fixed the tenant right had any idea of the principles on which he fixed it. The only evidence the public had had on that point was that the Sub-Commissioners took a shot at the mark.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I rise to Order. I do not think it is in Order to discuss the proceedings of a Committee upstairs.

MR. BRODRICK said, he was saying generally that this question of fixing the tenant right had been going on for over 13 years, and that the only statement made as to the mode of fixing it was that the Sub-Commissioners took a shot at the mark. He thought he was perfectly in Order in making that statement; and what he wanted to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, if it was true, as the right hon. Gentleman said, that the tenant right was already taxed for probate, on what principle was it taxed?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not want to waste any more time.

MR. BRODRICK said, those ejaculations were not arguments. He did not want to follow the example of disorder set to the Committee; but it was extremely difficult to avoid the suspicion that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer dismissed in one sentence a perfectly able and well-reasoned speech, the right hon. Gentleman had not got the facts at his fingers' ends.

MR. BARTLEY said, that as the Chancellor of the Exchequer persisted in refusing to give an answer he must pursue the matter further. He had asked the right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion a carefully-prepared question as to the amount received from the tenant right of the Irish tenants under the existing law, and the right hon. Gentleman refused to give an answer. That suggested that there was something at work behind the scenes which the Committee had a right to know. The silence of the Irish Members during this argument was only to be accounted for by the fact that they had been "squared" to keep quiet by the Government. It was ridiculous to suppose anything else, for the Irish Members would never have allowed a clause to go by unchallenged which would, if properly enforced, add to the expense of the Irish tenant a sum of not less than £70,000 a year to the Revenue. The other day he moved an Amendment urging that reversions should not be taxed, and the Government would not agree. The Solicitor General then said that a reversion was saleable every day, and to except it from taxation would be unfair to other forms of property. He now asked the Government to treat this Irish property on the same footing as they had decided to treat reversions. But he only got scant courtesy from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said the Irish tenants did not want the clause, and the Government would not accept it. It seemed the Irish tenants were the Rulers of the House. They governed the Government. It was plain from the action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there was something serious at the bottom of the matter. The Irish Members were really the masters of the situation. They were always grumbling at the taxation of Ireland, saying they paid too much, whereas the fact was that they did not pay enough. He thought he had a right to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intended by the Bill to tax the tenant right of the Irish tenants as fully, freely, and impartially as he intended to tax the English, Scotch, and Welsh, even down to the poor widow who had £25 a year left her? That was a fair question, and one to which the Committee had a right to demand an answer. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not give an answer, then the conclusion would be drawn that he was told by his masters, the Irish Members, that he was not to accept this proposal. But the Representatives of the taxpayers of the United Kingdom had a right to know why Irish tenants should not have to pay as fully as poor tenants in other parts of the Kingdom.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 118.—(Division List, No. 146.)

*SIR A. SCOBLE (Hackney, Central) moved in page 9, after Clause 13, to insert the following clause:—

(Exemption of pensions payable to widows.)

"Estate Duty shall not be collected or recovered upon the principal value of any pension payable to the widow or children of any public servant of the Crown, notwithstanding that the deceased may, in his lifetime, have contributed to the fund from which such pension is paid."

The hon. Member pointed out that if the pensions referred to were derived entirely from public funds they could not be taxed under the Bill, and it was certainly very hard that the widows and orphans should have to pay duty on the pensions they received simply because the husband or father contributed in his lifetime to the fund from which the pensions were drawn. The contributions were in some cases obligatory and not voluntary, and great injustice would be done to men in the Civil and Military Services in India especially, unless such pensions were exempted. It was the peculiarity of those Services that the men were obliged to contribute to the pension fund for widows and orphans, whether or not they were married, and they had not the slightest control whatever over the fund. The pension was not part of their estate in life; nothing passed, on their death, from them to their widows and children, and he thought, therefore, those pensions did not properly come within the purview of the intention of the Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had frequently said that the object of the Bill was not to tax the living, but the dead; but if the right hon. Gentleman did not grant this exemption, he would tax the living, and not the dead. It could not be contended that the intention of the Bill was to impose taxation on property of which the deceased person in his lifetime was not competent to dispose. But, under the terms of contribution to those pension funds, those who contributed to them had no power to dispose of them; they must go to the widow and children, and they could not be diverted from that object. Again, the Bill declared that duty was to be levied on property that passed at death. But in the case under consideration no property passed at death. The pension had never been in the control of the person who died, and it only came into existence at his death. If he recounted the hardships of many of those who received pensions from those funds he was sure he would have the sympathy of the Committee. He had known many cases in which officers in the Civil and Military Services of India, who were married and had children, were suddenly carried off by death, and when their estates came to be realised it was found that they had not left enough money to send their widows and children home. The hat had then to be sent round in the station to which the deceased officer belonged to make up the necessary fund for the purpose; and when, in addition to that, the widow and children were met on their arrival in England with a demand under the Bill, amounting to three-fourths of the first year's pension they were entitled to receive, they would have to start life in this country under circumstances of the most distressing and painful character. The widow would have to depend entirely on the assistance of her friends to meet the demand of the State, and he thought the demand of the State was one which, under the circumstances, should not be pressed.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am happy to be able to assure the hon. Member that the Government have great sympathy with the object of the proposed clause. We cannot, however, accept the clause in its present form, but I shall be glad to bring up a clause on Report which will meet the object the hon. Member has in view.

SIR A. SCOBLE said, he was quite ready to accept the promise of the right hon. Gentleman, but he would assure him, at the same time, that nothing short of a full and complete concession would meet the justice of the case.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion) moved, after Clause 34, to insert the following Clause:—

(Appearance on appeals.)

"Any person appealing against an assessment of Income Tax or Inhabited House Duty shall be entitled to appear by solicitor or agent."

If the principle of this clause were not adopted, great hardship would be inflicted on a considerable class of persons who desired to appeal. No doubt many capable business men would be able to dispense with the assistance of a solicitor, but there were a large class of fairly well educated working men and many business men who, although they might be well able to manage their ordinary affairs, would be utterly unable to cope with a smart Surveyor of Taxes who had every line of the Statute Law at his finger ends. Such people would often prefer to pay an exorbitant amount of Income Tax rather than expose their ignorance by appearing before the Commissioners. There were a large number of women in trade, and he ventured to say that nine out of ten of them would be subjected to any amount of Income Tax rather than themselves go and appeal. If they could be represented by a solicitor, probably they would be willing to go and give evidence before the Commissioners. In Wales there were a large number of partially-educated business people who were very diffident in these matters owing to their poor knowledge of the English language. The law permitted an appeal against the decision of the Commissioners. The Commissioners were required at the option of any appellant to state a case for the opinion of the High Court, and that appeal might be carried to the Court of Appeal and to the House of Lords. It seemed to him that it would be utterly unreasonable that the facts upon which such an appeal would have to be based should be got out without the assistance of a professional man.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that as a matter of practice it was extremely undesirable to multiply litigation more than was necessary. In 90 or 99 per cent. of these cases the questions raised were only questions of fact and account, which were settled by business men who represented their own cases; and he very much doubted whether the person taxed would not lose more by employing a solicitor than he would gain upon the Income Tax. On questions of law the Commissioners already allowed cases to be argued by solicitors.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS said, the Act expressly prohibited that.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Not on questions of law. All the Commissioners want to know in these cases is what they can gather from the Income Tax-payer himself, who can produce and explain his books.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) said, he was sorry not to be able to fall in with the view of the right hon. Gentleman. Under the existing law, barristers and solicitors were not allowed to plead before the Commissioners, and he thought it would be well if words were inserted providing that any person appealing against an assessment of Income Tax or Inhabited House Duty should be allowed, by leave of the Commissioners, but not otherwise, to appear by solicitor or agent. That would give the Commissioners control over the persons appearing, so that if they thought it necessary they would be entitled to refuse leave.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, it was very desirable that some concession should be made in this direction. He knew of a case of hardship where it was almost impossible for the person who had to pay the tax to appear in person to appeal. Surveyors of taxes might trade on the incapacity of people to conduct their own appeals in order to increase the tax.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. BUTCHER moved to insert the following Clause:—

(Protection of purchasers, mortgagees, trustees, &c.)

"Notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, the provisions of the 12th, 13th, and 14th Sections of 'The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889,' shall apply to the payment of Estate Duty under this Act, and shall for the purposes of this Act be read and have effect as if Estate Duty were therein mentioned as well as Legacy and Succession Duty."

In 1853 the Succession Duty was first imposed on real property, and between that date and 1889 all purchasers of real property found themselves in great difficulty if they wanted to find out if the Succession Duty had been paid. A great deal of expense was incurred in getting proof of it. That was found so intolerable that in 1889 the late Government passed some clauses to provide that after 12 years the purchaser should not be concerned to ascertain whether Succession Duty had been paid or not. That was a substantial benefit to the purchasers of real property, and enabled real property to be dealt with in an easier manner than it had been dealt with before. He had never heard that this had operated prejudicially. He took it that the Commissioners had taken good care to get the Succession Duty paid. The object of the new clause was to give to the purchasers of real estate the same protection in regard to the Estate Duty that they got by the Act of 1889 in regard to Succession Duty.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*SIR J. RIGBY said, he thought there was something in the Amendment, but he considered it would be a rather complicated business to apply the particular sections to the present measure. If the matter were postponed he would promise to see what could be done on the Report stage.

MR. BUTCHER said, he thanked the Attorney General, and would accede to his suggestion.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 1.

On the Motion of Mr. R. T. REID, the following Amendments were agreed to:—

Page 23, line 21, after "him," insert "or under any other disposition under which Estate Duty has been paid."

Schedule agreed to.

Schedules 2 and 3 agreed to.

Bill reported.

SIR W. HARCOURT: In furtherance of a promise I gave a few nights ago, I beg to move that the Bill be re-committed in respect of Clause 27.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be re-committed in respect of Clause 27,"—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer,)—put, and agreed to.

FINANCE (re-committed) BILL.—(No. 190.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 27.

Question proposed, "That Clause 27 stand part of the Bill."

*MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) said, he rose to move the rejection of the clause. In the Debate on the Second Reading he had taken the liberty of going somewhat into detail in reference to the effect of the Budget proposals on Ireland, especially those relating to the

Beer and Spirit Duties. For that reason and for the reason also that he had obtained no answer to the arguments which he put forward upon the Second Reading, he desired to say only a few words to-night. Personally he objected to almost every clause in the Budget, simply because they proposed to add to the taxation of Ireland, which was already too great. The distinction, however, between the other clauses and Clause 27 was that, whereas the former only increased the taxation of Ireland, Clause 27 not merely increased it, but did so in a flagrantly unjust proportion. The popular beverage in Ireland was whisky or spirits in one shape or another, and the system of taxing spirits, or of any other commodity, was uniform in all parts of the United Kingdom. For many years it was thought that nothing could be fairer than a uniform system of taxation, and everyone who rose up on behalf of Ireland to protest against the unfairness of the uniformity of taxation in respect of the tax on whisky was simply laughed at and solemnly lectured on his ignorance. Well, he had heard some of these lectures, and he remained of the opinion he had always entertained—namely, that to put a uniform tax throughout the Three Kingdoms upon an article chiefly consumed in Ireland was unjust, and the injustice was clearly demonstrated by the Paper which had been laid on the Table by the Chancellor of the Exchequer showing the effect of the proposed tax. He was not far wrong when he assumed that the greater part of the injustice arose entirely from the taxes on spirits. Out of the whole additional revenue which the Chancellor of the Exchequer expected to receive from the Beer and Spirit Duties—£1,180,000—Ireland ought to pay 1-26th, but instead of that she would pay one-ninth to one-tenth; and in saying what Ireland ought to pay, he was going upon the estimate formed of Ireland's relative liability to pay taxes, which was laid before the House of Commons by the present Government, as the basis of the financial proposals of the Home Rule Bill. Ireland's liability according to that estimate would be £40,000, whereas there would be collected in Ireland no less than £203,000, and there would actually be paid by consumers in Ireland £121,000. If the figures were correct, he thought he was entitled to base on that statement the assertion that this tax on spirits would fall on Ireland with exceptional weight, and at a time when she had no right to expect such a burden. If these proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were made for the first time it would be bad enough, and would be in flagrant violation of the Act of Union and of the promises made to Ireland that she should never be taxed on a uniform system with England and Scotland till the circumstances of the three countries became similar; but ever since 1860 these successive increases of duty had been going on. It was in 1860 that uniformity was established. Before then the Irish duties were low and the English duties were high. He thought he was right in saying that that relation between the two duties existed from the time of the Napoleonic Wars. The result of the change was that since 1860 Ireland had paid twice as much as she had paid before in respect of this particular tax, whereas England's increase of taxation in respect of this same article had not increased at all in proportion. He was blaming no particular Government for this injustice to Ireland. He blamed all Governments. Conservatives and Liberals had resorted to this expedient of plundering Ireland with equal readiness. Just as Dublin Castle had remained Tory no matter what the particular complexion of the Government in England had been, so, no matter what Government had the reins of Office in this country, whenever the need arose for meeting the expenses of a war, for making an addition to the British Navy, or for paying an indemnity to some Foreign Power, both Parties in the State agreed that the first and readiest and best thing to do was to take it out of Ireland by an increase in the Spirit Duties. The last Chancellor of the Exchequer to plunder Ireland in this way was the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, and he did think that for the right hon. Gentleman to put that extra 6d. on spirits was the most flagrant piece of trickery ever practised on Ireland by a British Minister. The right hon. Gentleman said that the money was to go to compensating publicans for taking their licences. Of course, everyone knew that not a penny went in that way, but, on the contrary, was devoted to bolstering up some ingenious scheme of finance of which the right hon.

Gentleman was the author. Now, to their surprise, it was not a Unionist Chancellor of the Exchequer, but it was a Home Rule Chancellor of the Exchequer who for the hundredth time attempted to plunder Ireland in the way he had described. He had heard it said that the tax would only amount to 1d. a bottle, and that the publican would have to pay it. He did not care a button who paid it, but what he wished to urge was that the money came out of Ireland and would never go back. Whoever paid the increased tax the English Government would get the benefit of it, and not Ireland. Whoever might pay under these increases of taxation, Ireland never benefited by them. The taxation was always inflicted to obtain something which concerned England alone. It was no Irish crisis that brought about an increase of taxation; and no money was expended on behalf of Ireland which would in any way justify an increase of taxation on Ireland. It was urged that England wanted to make an addition to her Navy. What benefit did Ireland get from the British Navy? Ireland got no benefit whatever from it. It was suggested that Irish commerce was protected by it, but Ireland had no commerce to protect worth speaking about. It had been destroyed by the Act of Union. This increase of taxation on Ireland, without bringing any benefit, was especially hard when money was so much wanted in Ireland itself. There were many public objects in Ireland on which money might be usefully expended. Money was needed for the congested districts in the west which never could be rescued from their present position without it, while a great deal of good could be done by improving the harbours round the coast and giving employment to the people. For years he had been trying unsuccessfully to obtain a small Vote for a harbour at Balbriggan. But not a penny was forthcoming from the Exchequer for such objects of public improvement. On the other hand, Ireland received money out of the British Treasury which was not for good or useful purposes; but for purposes of political corruption and for terrorizing the country with a large armed police force twice as large as it need be if Ireland was properly governed. Irishmen thought that it was time all this should end, and that a protest should be made against this continued system of fleecing Ireland for the benefit of this country. He thought the process had gone too far, and wanted to know where it was to end. To allow it to go further would be to inflict irreparable injury on Ireland. Therefore, in voting against the clause he should feel that he was decidedly acting in the best interests of his constituents and of Ireland.

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E.), in seconding the Motion, said that not only was the Government pledged as everybody knew to the establishment of a Legislature in Ireland, but they had appointed a Royal Commission to examine into the amount of taxation paid by the Irish people. Pending the issue of the Report of the Royal Commission many Irishmen thought that the Government might have refrained from placing this extra taxation on the Irish people. What was the object of appointing that Royal Commission if it was not to inquire whether Ireland was not paying too large a share of taxation already? The Government, however, would not wait for the result of the inquiry, but had at once proceeded to impose £200,000 or £300,000 extra taxation on the Irish people. He opposed the taxation not in the interest of the beer or spirit manufacturers or of any section, trade, or caste in the country, but simply as being unfair, and because it was being placed on one of the few remaining industries in Ireland employing large numbers of the population which ought not therefore to be disproportionately taxed. He opposed it also on the ground that he was totally opposed to the purpose for which the money was being raised. He believed that the great majority of the Irish people were opposed to the increase of the Navy, and to the expenditure of millions on warlike operations. This was not the proper time for discussing the propriety of those operations, but neither Liberal nor Radical Members of the House would dispute that not only the people of Ireland, but the vast majority of the toiling masses of this country, from whose pockets the money came, and not from those of wealthy distillers and brewers, were opposed to the expenditure of additional millions on the Navy. This country ought to set the example in disarming instead of competing in the mad work going on upon the Continent of ruining nations by the creation of immense Armies and Fleets. He agreed with the hon. Member for North Dublin that the Irish people gained nothing whatever from this expenditure. If a ship got disabled in Irish waters, instead of being repaired at Haulbowline or other Irish dockyards, she was towed off to some English port. It was said that British were sent for manœuvres in Irish waters, but all the benefit the people got from that was to hear from the shore the firing of a few heavy guns. Ireland had not incurred the illwill of the French or any other foreign people throughout the wide world, and it was absurd to say that she required the assistance of the British Fleet to protect her commerce. The English people had, at all events, the satisfaction of knowing that these millions were spent in her dockyards and workshops. It was a mean and shabby thing that, whenever a few additional ships were wanted for the Navy, the mighty and resourceful British Empire should seek to come down upon and cripple one of the few remaining industries of poor, unfortunate Ireland. He would not feel justified upon any consideration in consenting to this increased taxation on the people of Ireland, and the Government ought not to have proposed it.

Moved, "To leave out the Clause."—
(Mr. Clancy.)

SIR W. HARCOURT: As the Irish part of this subject has been treated somewhat apart from the rest, perhaps it will be right I should say something upon that aspect of the case, as it has been set before the Committee in the two speeches we have just heard. I understand that the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and those who act with him, intend to vote against this clause, but it would be interesting to know what common ground they take in their opposition. Is it upon the ground that the British Navy has bestowed no advantage upon the Irish people? Or is it upon the ground that, when for the public objects of the Empire a great expenditure is required, no part of that expenditure should be contributed by the Irish people?

MR. CLANCY: I never said anything of the sort.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Well, the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down used language distinctly to that effect.

MR. W. REDMOND said, he was sure that the right hon. Gentleman did not wish to misrepresent him. What he had meant to say was that the Irish people were asked altogether out of their fair proportion to bear taxation in this matter. With regard to the services of the Fleet, what he had in mind was that the only practically effective services rendered by any of Her Majesty's ships of war to Ireland in recent years was when a couple of them were despatched to carry out a number of evictions.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then I would ask whether that is the common ground upon which hon. Gentlemen opposite are going to act in regard to this clause? The hon. Member for North Dublin also laid down other principles. It is quite true that for a very long time the principle has been acted upon of uniform taxation throughout the United Kingdom—that is to say, that taxes fall on all parts of the United Kingdom in proportion to their population and their wealth as regards direct taxation. Again I ask, is it on the ground upon which hon. Members opposite accept the views of the hon. Member for North Dublin, and upon which they are going to join with him, or that he is going to join with them, to-night in endeavouring to put the Government into a minority upon Clause 27 of this Bill? The hon. Member who has just sat down said that the Government proposals will inflict a disproportionate taxation upon the Irish people. He says quite truly that we have given a Committee for the purpose of inquiring how far on the general principle of taxation a disproportionate rate of taxation has been put upon the Irish people, and that these inquiries are still going on. It was exactly upon the ground that these inquiries are going on that I agreed that this tax should only endure for one year, so that if it appeared in the end that the contentions of the hon. Member and his friends were justified and well-founded that disproportion might be corrected when it was ascertained. But the only point that I really desire to press upon the Committee is that in the proposals of the present Budget we have not aggravated that disproportion, if it exists, but, on the contrary, we have diminished it. In the Return to which the hon. Member for North Dublin referred, and which gives the proportion of the Irish contribution upon the present basis of taxation, the proportion of Irish contribution is put at one-tenth of that of England. That is quite certain. It is £7,521,000, as compared with £72,756,000, the amount of the English contribution. Therefore, at present the contribution of Ireland is something more than one-tenth of the whole taxation. Now, if you come to proposals of the Budget, you will find that the suggested contribution of Ireland, taking the taxation as a whole, is less than one-tenth of the English contribution. Ireland has to contribute £280,000, as against £2,162,000 that England has to contribute. Therefore, where, as at present, under the existing system of taxation the contribution of Ireland is more than one-tenth, under the proposals of the Budget it will be less than one-tenth. In that case it cannot be said that the proposals of the Budget aggravate that disproportion of taxation which the hon. Gentleman intends to resist. I do not admit that we are acting unfairly to Ireland in the matter. Of course, if the hon. Member is prepared to contend that we are to call upon Ireland for no contribution at all or that we are to establish a differential taxation for Ireland as compared with England, that is another thing; but it is a contention that we could not undertake to press upon this Committee. But if it is contended that under these Budget proposals we have increased the share of Ireland's liability relatively to England's I venture to point out that that is not the case. I understand that the hon. Member is going to vote against us on this clause. I confess I have some curiosity to know what principles are held on this subject in common by the hon. Member and hon. Members opposite. I am inclined to believe that they have some very different reasons for the vote they are about to give than those which he would give for his action. Hon. Members opposite have agreed without any difficulty to the taxation upon foreign spirits. Not a word was said—the clause passed without opposition or discussion. They did not take that course with regard to the clause relating to the increased duty upon beer, and it was very natural and very proper that they took a different course in relation to the Beer Duty. The result of their opposition to this clause would be that they would raise a differential duty upon Jamaica rum and would refuse to give it upon British whisky. That is the foundation upon which the proposal stands. It would be impossible for any Opposition to press upon any Government the adoption of such a course. As I have before pointed out—and I desire to repeat it now upon this occasion—if you reject this clause, which proposes to raise the money required for the service and the defence of the country by indirect taxation, you will have in the future to rely exclusively upon direct taxation. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) the other day asked whether this was direct or indirect taxation. I can answer the right hon. Gentleman in his own words. On the Second Reading of the Bill he said—

“I ask the question. Is this direct or indirect taxation? There is confusion in the mind on this point, and I am not sure I have not shared the confusion myself,” and at the time the right hon. Gentleman was opposing the duty on beer on the ground that it would fall on the consumer. Then the right hon. Gentleman, speaking of myself, said—

“The right hon. Gentleman did not say whether he considers it to be direct or indirect taxation. The general rule seems to be”—

this is rather a curious and candid confession—

“that at the time when you are persuading the House to impose the duty it is a direct tax on the profits of the brewer, but after the tax is imposed that forms a portion of the indirect taxation levied on the country.”

That is the right hon. Gentleman's solution of the question whether this is a direct or indirect tax. And I rely upon the explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman, and think the Committee will appreciate the definition. But he says—

“I understand and believe in this case—as regards spirits at any rate—I am not sure about beer—the tax will be borne by the consumer.”

If he believes that now, is he going to vote against this tax? It is quite clear that the right hon. Gentleman is of opinion that this is an indirect tax, and I have never denied that this additional penny a bottle on spirits is pro tanto an indirect tax. I do not think a penny a bottle on spirits is a large sum to ask as a contribution to the defence of the country. I do not suppose anybody believes that I or any Chancellor of the Exchequer would face the difficulties and dangers which we know attend a proposal to tax beer and spirits in this country, except upon the conviction that it was a fair and proper thing to do, and that it was consistent with sound principles of finance. Everybody knows we would gladly avoid the controversy we are having to-night if we thought we could properly do so. Then I want to know on what ground it is the Conservative Party are going to vote against this contribution towards the defence of the country? This is what I have a right to know, and what, in their opinion, we ought to propose in its place. We might have taxed some other articles. What other articles? Were we to tax tea? Were we to tax sugar? Were we to tax tobacco? Sir Stafford Northcote put an extra tax on tobacco, and what was the consequence? The Revenue was not increased; but since the tax on tobacco has been diminished, the Revenue from tobacco has increased. I venture to say that if there was to be indirect taxation no other tax than this could have been adopted. Then the conclusion of the Party opposite is, I suppose—and I am surprised at it—that they are against indirect taxation. They are prepared, when £4,000,000 has to be raised for the Navy, to go exclusively upon property and all direct taxation. If they were to succeed to-night that would be the inevitable consequence of their vote. We have made a proposal of which this is a part, and the Committee has determined the tax upon beer should be sustained. The Committee has determined that the Customs Duty upon spirits shall be raised. We are now at the very last stage, in the very last verse of the last chapter of the Committee on this Bill; and is the Committee, having resolved to put a tax upon beer, having determined to put a Customs Duty on spirits, now going to refuse to put an Excise Duty on spirits as provided by this clause? A course so irrational and so inconsistent with the principles of sound finance I believe this House has never adopted, and I feel sure they will not adopt it on this occasion.

*MR. YOUNG (Cavan, E.) said, he considered the Chancellor of the Exchequer was initiating a new principle in finance that the poor should be taxed and the rich saved from taxation. The Budget, on the whole, was the best that had been presented to the country for 20 years. He regarded, however, this extra 6d. per proof gallon on whisky as an evil, and he objected to it very strongly indeed. It was out of all proportion that 13s. 4d. should be put on a gallon of spirits 25 degrees over proof, which cost only from 1s. 3d. to 2s. 6d. in its production. Besides, the amount which would be raised by this extra 6d. was so small that it was absolutely absurd to impose it. At a distiller, and one largely connected with the trade, he had had very serious reflections as to the manner in which he should give his vote in this matter, and if he personally considered his position he should certainly take a course which he hesitated to take that night, for he felt that as a Member of Parliament he had no right to consider his personal interests so much as the interests of his country. Therefore, he put selfish considerations aside, and said that the Government was the first in his memory which had grasped the situation of Ireland, it was the first Government that had given just legislation to them, and which seemed anxious to meet the desires of a country that had been trodden down since the year 1800; besides, he expected from the present Government, in the future useful measures of a far-reaching kind calculated to bring peace and contentment to his country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had made a concession which made the way clear, for he had conceded the point that this duty should go off automatically on 1st July, 1895. Therefore, although he considered it an evil to place this extra duty on whisky he considered it would be a greater evil for him to assist to displace the present Government. He had therefore determined to go into the Lobby in support of the Government.

MR. COMBE (Surrey, Chertsey) said, it had often been remarked in the course of the Debate that the brewers and distillers were taking the part of the agriculturists, and that the agriculturists were fighting the battle of the brewers and distillers. He was not a licensed victualler, but he proposed to take up the cudgels on behalf of that injured individual, and to lay his case as fairly and as impartially as he could before the Committee. There was no doubt that this additional tax of 6d. upon spirits in addition to the 6d. upon the barrel of beer would very seriously affect the licensed victualler, and not only would it affect his income, but it would also very very seriously affect his capital, which was his public-house. Beyond that it would also affect all those who had shares in Public Companies, whether they be debentures or preferences, and whose security was represented to a very large extent by the loans on the various public-houses. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had an exaggerated view of the profits of Brewery Companies, as he had of the profits of licensed victuallers. He remembered on the Second Reading of this Bill seeing a broad smile spread over the right hon. Gentleman's face when one of his supporters got up behind him and quoted a large number of figures showing the enormous profits that brewers made. Well, that was not of much account, for he (Mr. Combe) was able to take out this morning just as many figures showing that there were good breweries whose profits ranged from 3 per cent. to 6 per cent., but he would not trouble the Committee with them. As regarded the licensed victualler, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "Oh, it does not matter putting this additional 6d. upon him; it will only tend to lower in an inappreciable degree his already inordinate profit," profits varying from 10 to 300 per cent. He did not know how the right hon. Gentleman made out that, and he would be doing good service, he thought, if he succeeded in disabusing the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to those exceedingly large profits. He remembered on the Second Reading of the Bill the right hon. Gentleman pounced upon the fact that he had said that the profits of licensed victuallers were something like 30 per cent. Of course he meant the gross profits, the difference between the buying and selling price of the article. He said 30 per cent., and he would have been perfectly accurate if they were to take every public-house in London. But since then he had had taken out by an auctioneer the profits of 32 public-houses, and he would just take four or five of them. They showed that the profits, so far from being 10 to 300 per cent., did not come anywhere near that. There was one case where the yearly takings were £2,587, gross profits 34½; another case, £13,310, gross profits 39½; another case, £5,600, gross profits 35½; and another case £6,300, gross profits 33. There was just one case that went against his argument, because it showed gross profits of 49 per cent. The total of the 32 publichouses gave a yearly taking of £138,000, giving an average profit of 38 per cent. He was not, therefore, very far out. But these were good houses. From that 38 per cent. they had to reduce the money to be found for licenses, rent, rates, and taxes, interest, repairs, wages, gas, coals, depreciation of lease, management, and so on, which brought it down to somewhere near 10 per cent. These figures, he thought, showed as clearly as possible what the profits of public-houses really were, so far as they could get them, and they proved that the licensed victualler was not rolling in that wealth which he was generally supposed to roll in—in fact, in many cases he had as much as he could do to make ends meet. Such being the case, it could not be wondered at that the licensed victualler viewed with considerable alarm any attempt to impose an additional burden upon him, and he would do his best to shift that burden off his own shoulders to the shoulders of somebody else. Small blame to him for that, because he already provided far more than his share of the national income; that would be readily admitted when it was known that the licensed victuallers provided now a quarter of the national income. One had only to glance at the Bankruptcy Returns, and he would see that the number of licensed victuallers who were becoming bankrupt was yearly increasing, and this in spite of the fact that the consumption of spirits and beer tended not to diminish, but rather to increase. As a matter of fact, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was doing to the licensed victuallers what he was grumbling at the big brewers for doing. The right hon. Gentleman complained that the big brewers were monopolising the whole trade and driving out the smaller brewers. The right hon. Gentleman was doing exactly the same thing to the licensed victuallers. If the brewer succeeded under the pressure of this Bill in reducing the gravity of his beer to make up for his loss, and if the licensed victualler succeeded in diluting his spirits to make up for the loss which he would have to bear, there would be three broad results from this Bill. The public would get a far worse article than they had been accustomed to drink, and he only hoped the Division which they would soon have would prove that the proposal of the Government had not met with the general approval of the Committee.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's) said, that he personally was not interested in the consumption of spirits, but he must protest, as a temperance man, against the increased taxation, because he found that an increase of taxation on liquor did not produce a smaller consumption, but that it was attended by an almost equal ratio as regarded the consumption. He entirely disbelieved in this financial coercion. Temperance could only be promoted by the establishment of free libraries, parks, and example; while the only way to keep the people out of the public-houses was by providing them with decent dwellings, and until that was done financial coercion of the liquor traffic would never bring about sobriety. As the Representative of the St. Patrick's Division of Dublin, in which was situate the largest brewery in the world, and which brewery did not possess a single tied house, he desired to protest against the proposed increased taxation. His constituents had passed a resolution protesting against the increased duty on spirits; therefore he was bound, as the Member representing that constituency, to vote against the proposal. He objected to the proposal on other grounds—namely, those of national taxation. He found from a study of the taxation of Ireland that since Mr. Gladstone came into Office, in 1857, the taxation in Ireland had gone on increasing by leaps and bounds, and that taxation had been mainly for the benefit of English workmen. They got no share of it in Ireland. It was the British workers who received a great deal of the benefit and Irish workers received none. The result of that taxation tended to increase emigration among the Irish population. He had received a Return from the Treasury which showed that 1,727,786 gallons of foreign spirits were imported annually into Great Britain and Ireland. What became of all that? He wondered whether it was manufactured into Irish whisky, and he held that the Government ought certainly to take some steps to see that it was not manufactured to suit the palates of those who consumed it. He had found from a recent Return that 20,000 acres of wheat land had gone out of cultivation.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he must point out to the hon. Member that he was hardly speaking to the clause.

MR. FIELD said, that he was coming to the subject. He found that during the past four years 17,000 acres of land devoted to the cultivation of barley had fallen into disuse. If this increased taxation was agreed to they would find that about 78,000 acres of barley land would go out of cultivation during the next four years. That, he thought, was a matter which was very germane to the points at issue. There could be no doubt that many English Members would vote for the increased tax believing that it would only be levied for one year; but he would point out that in the whole fiscal government of the country when a tax had been imposed on liquor it had never been taken off. He hoped that every Irish Member would vote against the increased duty, although he knew it was a vain hope. As a teetotaler and a temperance man he opposed these duties, because he did not believe that they were likely to make people more sober by coercion of this kind.

*MR. BONSOR (Surrey, Wimbledon) said, he did not intend to follow the Irish Members in discussing this question, because, on the whole, he failed to understand their position. They had one Irish Member protesting against the additional taxation because he was unconnected with the trade, and they had another supporting it because he was connected with the trade. The Committee must be sorry that the Debates on this Bill were drawing to a conclusion, as they had advanced some steps since its introduction. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in introducing the Bill, told them he was levying the tax on beer and spirits in such a manner that it would not fall upon the consumer, but would be paid direct by the brewers, the distillers, and the licensed victuallers. That evening, however, he had given up that part of the argument, because he now said that the tax was an indirect tax and would fall upon the consumer. He quoted the late Chancellor of the Exchequer in favour of this view.

SIR W. HARCOURT said, that when introducing the Bill he admitted that the tax upon spirits would amount to a penny a bottle, and this, he contended, was not a very large sum to charge for the defence of the country.

MR. BONSOR said, he admitted that that was said, but the right hon. Gentleman went on to quote the late Chancellor of the Exchequer to the effect that this kind of tax was indirect taxation. Consequently the right hon. Gentleman had given up his contention in introducing the Budget Bill, when he said that the tax would fall directly upon the brewer, the distiller, and the publican, and he now admitted that the tax would in the long run be paid by the consumer. [Sir W. HARCOURT: No.] The right hon. Gentleman said "No," but he admitted that the penny a bottle would be paid by the consumer. Did he contend that with regard to the spirits sold by the publican by the gill that that would not fall on the consumer?

SIR W. HARCOURT said, he drew a distinction between the case of the beer and the spirits. With regard to the beer, it would fall upon the brewer and the consumer; but as to the spirits, it would no doubt be paid by the purchasers of spirits by the bottle.

*MR. BONSOR said, he thought they had made some progress when they had the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitting that with regard to some part, at all events, of this tax it would fall upon the consumer. He believed that the whole of it would fall on the consumer. As was said in the case of the Beer Tax, he anticipated that the consumer would get a worse article, and he would tell them why. He had taken considerable trouble to ascertain what the views of licensed victuallers were, and he had not yet found a single licensed victualler who would admit that he was going to pay the tax. Some said at once that they were going to reduce the strength of the spirits down to the lowest possible limit allowed by law. In these cases they had sold the article above the legal strength. In the case of other licensed victuallers who did a cutting trade, and were compelled by competition to sell their spirits at the lowest strength allowed by law, they said that they would ask their distillers to supply them at a lower price. They were talking more particularly about whisky, the price of which varied from 10s. 6d. to 15s. per gallon. The 6d. additional tax would represent about 5 per cent. per annum on the article. They would have only to sell the wine or spirits exactly one year younger, and so recover the tax. It would therefore fall in this case absolutely upon the consumer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made a great deal of the fact that they had passed the Customs Tax on spirits, and were opposing the Excise Tax, and were therefore willing to give a preferential rate in favour of the home production over that imported from abroad. He certainly should not be adverse to taxing the bad German spirits which were blended with Irish and Scotch whiskies, and sold to the consumers as the genuine article. He believed if an extra tax was placed upon bad foreign spirits that a great amount of good would result to the Revenue, as it certainly would to the consumers. He was a Free Trader, but he was rather in favour of Protectionist views in so far as the interests of the consumers in this matter were concerned. He should like to protect this inner organisations against bad spirits, which injured alike the constitution and the brain. He was glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had abandoned the idea that the tax would fall upon the brewers, the distillers, and the publicans alone. The right hon. Gentleman told them that he was anxious for the prosperity of the liquor trade, and would like to see brewers prosperous and ready like lambs to be again shorn. His speech was worth the penny a bottle he proposed to charge on spirits. He should vote against the clause.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): I rise at the invitation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is anxious to know what some of us upon this side of the House think with regard to his proposals, and I trust that even at this hour I may be allowed to make the few observations which the Chancellor of the Exchequer wishes to elicit from me. In the first place, let me brush aside one of those absurdities with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer loves to disfigure his arguments. He said that now having passed the clause which imposed this duty on foreign spirits we were going to establish Protection. Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer forget that we did not discuss the additional duty upon Customs in order to save the time of the House and in order to simplify the discussion? Is it not trifling with the House for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring forward arguments such as this? I challenge the Chancellor of the Exchequer to deny what I have said.

SIR W. HARCOURT: All I can say is that if the right hon. Gentleman defeats this clause the other clause will remain.

MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir, it will not remain, because we will move it out on Report. That is another of those specious rhetorical arguments of the right hon. Gentleman. Possibly other results might happen which it is unnecessary to point out. Now I will address myself to the real argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If I had left this argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer alone, hon. Members would have stated to their constituents that we had gone for Protection, and imposed a duty on foreign spirits which we did not wish to impose on home spirits. Now I have disposed of that argument. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked whether we adopt the arguments of the hon. Members for Ireland who opposed this clause, and asked what common ground we could have. Now, Sir, we do not occupy common ground with those gentlemen. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might have heard that the hon. Member attacked them as strongly and more severely than he attacked the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I differ entirely with the view put forward by the hon. Member for the County of Dublin, when he said that Government after Government had attempted to plunder Ireland by increasing the Spirit Duty. I venture to deny that position on behalf of all Governments, whether Liberal or Conservative. The Spirit Duty has been taken for other reasons. Certainly at no period of history was it taken because it would fall more heavily on Ireland. When the late Government proposed the Spirit Duty there was only one-third of it originally intended for the purchase of public-houses, and when that fell to the ground Ireland, as England, benefited through education and other means to the full share to which it was considered that Ireland was entitled. I congratulate Her Majesty's Government most heartily that my most fervent opponents on that occasion are silent to-night. Night after night they disputed the propriety of imposing a tax upon whisky, though on that occasion it was settled that a portion of it was to go to Ireland. But Her Majesty's Government have received their support; and why? Because the Chancellor of the Exchequer has agreed that the tax should only last for one year. That, I understand, has been the bargain which prevents hon. Members from Ireland from voting against the Government. Let me point out how this conflicts with the virtuous tendencies of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He held out to us that this was indirect taxation that was to take its place side by side with direct taxation, but he makes an arrangement by which the direct taxation is to continue permanently while the indirect taxation is only to be put on for a year, with infinite confusion to trade, and probably infinite confusion to the Budget that is to follow. And that is how he thinks he carries out the great principle of direct and indirect taxation going together. The Chancellor of the Exchequer wishes to know on what grounds we oppose this tax. I oppose it on several grounds. The right hon. Gentleman says if we do not now support the duty on spirits and beer we shall never again be able to impose indirect taxation. Why not? That same statement was made in 1885, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer has had the courage to do so, and I had that courage.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Both on spirits.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, both on spirits; but that was not the point of the right hon. Gentleman. There is one view that I hold very strongly, that a tax of 6d. put on for a year only disarranges the whole trade, and such a tax not to be taken off by Act of Parliament, but to end automatically, is a bad system. What would the right hon. Gentleman put in the place of this tax? He had pledged himself to one year if the Royal Commission report against this impost. It would have been more candid, and more in accordance with the traditions of finance, if the right hon. Gentleman had found these resources now instead of next year. The question was asked, "Is this direct or indirect taxation?" Practically this tax is to be paid by the consumer. It can be evaded altogether by lowering the strength of the spirit which is sold across the counter. Proof spirit is taxed, and there is a very considerable margin for water being mixed with the spirit, and if more water is used less spirit pays the duty, so that you lose your additional 6d. on the whole duty which otherwise would be paid, and you do not get the advantage which the Chancellor of the Exchequer expects. Therefore, you disarrange the trade and your Budget, and do not get your money. I should like to know what was the effect of the increase which I put on, but we have not been informed on that point. If I had been in the position of the right hon. Gentleman, I should not have dealt with the same class on the very next occasion of imposing a tax. There are other means of raising Revenue besides this increased Spirit Duty, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer knows it well, or he would never have consented to make the tax temporary. For the reasons I have given I shall vote against this proposal.

SIR F. MILNER (Notts, Bassetlaw) wished to know whether in any case the increased duties, both on beer and whisky, were only to be levied for one year?

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, that no advantage was to be gained from the tax coming off automatically, because, having to come off in July, it would have previously been renewed in April. He complained that the supporters of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were continually explaining his meaning in a sense opposite to that which the right hon. Gentleman had himself used.

He supposed that the Committee would agree to the imposition of the tax, and that England would be able to wipe off £7,000,000 of her Debt this year. He thought England might very well have been content to pay off only £6,000,000 of her Debt and to have left the Spirit Duty alone. He had not much faith in the removal of the extra duty next year, and he must vote against it.

Question put.

VOL. XXVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

LOCOMOTIVE THRESHING ENGINES
BILL.—(No. 124.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

VISCOUNT CROSS, in moving the Second Reading of the Bill, said: My Lords, you are aware that by the existing Act of Parliament a locomotive threshing machine cannot be used within a certain distance of the high road, and that farmers have found that restriction very inconvenient; because they required to place the stacks, both hay and corn, near the roads, that they may be carried away as easily as possible. This Bill is to get rid of the difficulty experienced from being unable to place the stacks near the roads. The promoters of the Bill are, of course, quite willing to submit to any restriction that may be thought necessary for ensuring the safety of the public travelling along the roads. It is, therefore, proposed that when a threshing-machine is at work, somebody shall be stationed out on the road to signal the approach of carriages or other vehicles drawn by horses, when the working of the threshing machine must be at once absolutely stopped. Of course, if the persons working the machine do not stop it, they will be liable to precisely the same penalty as under the existing law. It seems to me that is a very proper course to take, and I hope your Lordships will give the Bill a Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Viscount Cross.)

THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD said, the Local Government Board had no objection whatever to offer.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

POLICE (SLAUGHTER OF INJURED ANIMALS) BILL, now INJURED ANIMALS BILL.—(No. 124.)

THIRD READING.

Read 3^a (according to Order), with the Amendments.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he had an Amendment to move in Clause 2, line 8, after the word ("shall," to insert ("if the owner is absent or refuses to consent to the destruction of the animal.") It had been pointed out that if the owner were present and willing to have his animal destroyed, it would still be necessary, as the Bill stood, for the constable to get a certificate from a veterinary surgeon. It was to meet that objection that this Amendment was proposed.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

TITHE RENTCHARGES (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE moved—

"That there be laid before the House a Return giving the following information with reference to the terms at present charged by the Treasury for the redemption of tithe rentcharge, vested in the Land Commission in Ireland:—

1. When the tithe rentcharge is capitalised at 22½ years' purchase, what annuity and what term of years would be necessary to repay each £100 of capital if the rate of interest charged were respectively (a) 3 per cent., or (b) 3½ per cent.:
2. If the rate of interest were respectively (a) 3 per cent., or (b) 3½ per cent., what capital sum would have been received by the Treasury at the end of 52 years in respect of £100, made repayable by an annuity of £4 9s. 6d. during that term:
3. What rate of interest accrues to, or is obtained by, the Treasury on an annuity of £4 9s. 0d. per cent., payable during 52 years:
4. Why did the Treasury in 1869 recommend the Government of the day to alter the terms from an annuity of £4 10s. 0d. (including interest at 3½ per cent.) for 45 years, to an annuity of £4 9s. 0d. per cent. for 52 years:
5. On what grounds have the Treasury declined to act upon the recommendation of the Irish Land Commissioners, that tithe rentcharge vested in the Irish Land Commission should in future be made redeemable at 20 instead of 22½ years' purchase, under the provisions of Section 15 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887."

He said, this Return had reference to an answer given him a month ago by the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary, in the absence of the noble Earl the head of the Government. On that occasion he quoted from Mr. Gladstone's speech, in introducing the Irish Church Act in 1869, the statement that it was very desirable the tithe rentcharge payable by Irish landowners should be commuted at 22½ years' purchase money down, or else that the tithe rentcharge should be brought up in the form of a Terminable Annuity based upon the same principle. The terms offered were that £2,250 should be charged for every annual sum of £100 paid by the landowner. It was, in the first instance, proposed that £4 10s. should be paid for 45 years to redeem the capital sum, £1 to be considered as capital, and £3 10s. as interest. That was the bargain offered by Mr. Gladstone to the Irish landlords, and upon that purchases were made, though, no doubt, at least two-fifths of them had not purchased in that way. When the Bill of 1869 got into Committee, however, Mr. Gladstone, in an incidental and casual manner, without explanation, mentioned that he had altered the term from 45 years at £4 10s. to 52 years at £4 9s.; and, further, he threw over the compulsory part of the scheme. People at the present day understood these kinds of financial arrangements better; but Mr. Gladstone himself described it at the time as a financial proposal which must puzzle everybody except experts. At the present time many other things besides tithe rentcharges were brought up in this way. It had now been ascertained that, instead of repaying the exact sum borrowed, Irish landlords would either have to pay a great deal more in the shape of capital than was lent to them, or a much higher rate of interest than was payable according to Mr. Gladstone's offer. A calculation which had been sent to him, made presumably by an expert, showed that, instead of paying £3 10s., they were really paying £3 16s. 3½d. The Treasury admitted the correctness of this, for Mr. Goschen, on a former occasion, when the question was put to him, had the calculation made, and those were found to be the figures. As regarded the first three heads of his Motion, it would be useless to trouble their Lordships with actuarial calculations which he doubted his power to make intelligible; but the last heads of his notice referred not, indeed, to actuarial questions, but certainly to questions of finance, with which might be mixed up matters of policy. That he did not know. What he wanted to know was why Mr. Gladstone made this alteration in Committee, and why, when Parliament had subsequently in 1887 admitted the hardship to the Irish landowner, and had given power to the Irish Land Commission to redeem the tithe rentcharge at a lower rate than 22½ years' purchase, the Treasury should set aside that power, and should have declined, so far, to recognise it? He was now seeking for information, and he hoped that a sufficiently strong case would be made out as to induce Parliament in some future Session to reconsider this matter, and to do justice to Irish landlords. It had been said they had not much to complain of, because, but for this arrangement, they would have had to go on paying tithe rentcharge for ever, and were only paying the same thing now in the shape of an annuity. That was not exactly the case, but it was so near that no point need be made of that. But another point of more importance was that in those days the tithe rent was not a fixed charge, but varied with the price of corn. That price had gone down within the last 10 years, and in some parts of Ireland people were paying less lay tithes than formerly. It was a hardship that the ecclesiastical tithe charge should remain stereotyped at what it was in 1869. It did not at all follow that they would have gone on paying it for ever. This was not a Party matter at all, and if there were any difficulty he would be glad to get the information in any other form that might be more convenient.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Earl of Rosebery): My Lords, I cannot, of course, supply the grounds upon which Mr. Gladstone took a certain course on a particular occasion, because I have no cognizance of them. The Treasury finds some difficulty in giving the information in the exact form in which the noble Earl has asked for it, but they have no wish to withhold any information they can give, and will, if the noble Earl asks for it, supply a Memorandum giving all the facts they can upon the subject. If that does not suffice, the noble Earl can, on a future occasion, move for further information in another form.

LORD ASHBOURNE said, the noble Earl's statement was most conciliatory and reasonable as far as it went, but he hoped that the information supplied by the Treasury would show clearly how the annuity of £4 9s. was made up, and what was the rate of interest. He should also like to know why the Treasury had refused to sanction recommendations as to a lower rate of redemption made by the Irish Land Commission? The right of appeal under which substantial reductions might have been obtained had been taken away by a section in a subsequent Act. In the purchase legislation passed from 1885 to 1892 the rate of interest fixed was moderate, and it was not reasonable that those who were purchasing tithe-rent annuities should pay a higher rate than persons who were paying under the Purchase Acts. When the Treasury were asked to alter the purchase rates for their tithe rentcharges under the Land Commission some years ago, they intimated that they would be guided largely by the recommendations of the Land Commission. The Land Commission had recommended a lower rate of redemption, but the Treasury had not sanctioned it.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: It was recommended by the late Lord of the Treasury.

LORD ASHBOURNE believed the conscience of the Board of Treasury remained not much altered: though the men might change, what stood in the place of conscience went on. Of course, the noble Earl was not responsible until a more recent time; but now that his attention had been specially directed to the matter, perhaps he would look into it.

THE EARL OF BELMORE consented to withdraw his Motion on the understanding that the information for which he asked would be supplied in a Memorandum by the Treasury in another form.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

QUESTIONS.

THE CANADIAN CATTLE TRADE.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he can state what is the progress of the inquiry, in which the right hon. Member for Bury and Dr. Burdon Sanderson are concerned, into the diseased lungs of beasts landed at Liverpool from Montreal by s.s. Toronto and Mongolian on the 20th of May and 6th of June ; and how soon the inquiry will be concluded ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden) : With the assistance of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury and Dr. Burdon Sanderson, I have obtained the evidence of ten of the professional gentlemen, who, in addition to the veterinary officers of my own Department, were invited to examine the diseased portion of the lungs of one or both of the animals referred to by my hon. Friend. The examination of witnesses is not quite complete, but it is already clear to me that the inquiry need not be a very protracted one, and I hope it may not be very long before I am in a position to publish the evidence and the conclusion at which I have arrived thereon.

THE COST OF THE LABOUR COMMISSION.

MR. J. E. ELLIS : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the total sum which the Labour Commission has cost the country up to the present time ; and what additional sum is estimated to be requisite to complete the expenditure on its account ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (SIR J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) : The Labour Commission has cost a sum of £45,882 up to the present time, and £1,253 is estimated to be still required—total, £47,135 (exclusive of the rent of premises belonging to the Government, which would have amounted for the whole period to about £2,592). The total amount is probably larger than has ever been expended on any Commission before.

LONG-SENTENCE PRISONERS.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green) : On behalf of the hon. Member for Middleton (Mr. Hopwood), I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is the duty of anyone to bring to his notice cases of sentence of long imprisonment or of penal servitude for small offences, because committed after previous convictions ; and whether his attention has been drawn to a number of such cases collected by the Howard Association, some of which are related in a letter of the secretary to The Times, 15th April, 1887—namely, for stealing a garden fork to 10 years, for stealing a cup to five years, for stealing watercresses and shell fish to eight years, for stealing some herrings and provisions to five years, &c. ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.) : It is not the special duty of anyone to bring such cases to the notice of the Secretary of State, but the prisoners themselves have full liberty to do so. Any prisoner who is dissatisfied with his sentence is free at any time to petition the Secretary of State; every such Petition is carefully considered. (There were 4,365 such Petitions last year, and 421 Reports of juvenile offenders; all cases of juvenile offenders under the age of 14 committed to prison being reported to the Secretary of State.) This right of petition is well known, and prisoners freely avail themselves of it; and if they cannot write, are assisted by the chaplain or schoolmaster in writing the Petition. Sentences such as those described in the question are not passed, save on habitual offenders, whom, in the opinion of the Court, lighter punishments had failed to deter; nor are such sentences served without repeated Petitions from the convict, and often from other persons, to the Secretary of State.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN THE BALLYMENA UNION.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.) : On behalf of the hon. Member for South Antrim, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any Report has been made by Mr. Agnew, Local Government Board Inspector, as to the necessity or otherwise for labourers' cottages in the Portglenone Division of Ballymena Union; and why his recommendations, if any, have not been carried out ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : The Inspector reported in favour of the erection of two cottages in the Portglenone Division, and two in the Ballyscullion Division of this Union, and on the 21st of June the Local Government Board issued a Provisional Order authorising the erection of these cottages.

GREENWICH CUSTOMS BOATMEN.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the Customs boatmen and preventive officers stationed on Brown's Wharf Station, which extends from Greenwich to Barking, a distance of seven miles, were on duty from 8 a.m. on Thursday, June 21, to 5 a.m. on Friday, June 22; that, besides searching vessels for concealments of tobacco and clearing vessels for export cargoes, the men rowed during that time a distance of over 40 miles against and with the current of the river; whether the boats in which they rowed have been from 18 to 20 years in the water, and are consequently soddened and "dead weight" to row; will he explain why the steam launch, which until recently assisted the men, has now been withdrawn; and whether he will take steps to prevent the employment of these men for such long hours ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I am informed that, in accordance with the 24 hours system, one of the three crews on the Brown's Wharf Station—extending from Greenwich to Barking, a distance of seven miles—attended for any duty that might be required of them, from 8 a.m. on Thursday, June 21, to 8 a.m. on the day following, when they were in ordinary course relieved by another crew. The responsible superior officer reports that the rowing crew traversed not a distance of 40 miles against and with the stream, but less than half that distance, two-thirds of which was with the stream. The actual continuous service rendered is stated in the journal of the officer in charge to have been nine hours. The row-boats used on the station are in excellent repair, and there is no ground for the statement that they are sodden and "dead-weight" to row. The steam launch has not at any time been withdrawn from the assistance she renders to the station.

MR. MACDONALD : Would it not be possible to alter the system ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The matter has been carefully considered. It was found that the hours are not so serious as they appear on paper. The moment the men cease work they have 24 hours liberty, and their actual continuous service is, as I have stated, only nine hours.

DUBLIN QUIT RENT OFFICE.

*MR. O'DRISCOLL (Monaghan, S.): On behalf of the hon. Baronet the Member for West Kerry, I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will state how many officials are employed in the Quit Rent Office, in Dublin; the length of their respective services in the office; whether any new appointments have lately been made there; what method is followed in appointing them; and who is responsible for their appointment? At the same time, I may ask the right hon. Gentleman the question which is on the Paper in my name upon the same subject—namely, if he will explain on what grounds it is now proposed to discharge the one Catholic on the staff of the Quit Rent Office, Dublin, though he is a fully qualified solicitor, and has four years' service, while three of the others have only one year's service or less; whether three of the senior officials have been transferred from London, from the Office of Woods, to Dublin; does this involve large expenditure to the Treasury; and what steps it is proposed to take to make this office, which is purely Irish, open to Irishmen and to Catholics?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Five persons are employed in the Quit Rent Office, Dublin, besides two temporary clerks and one messenger. There is no proposal to discharge any person who is on the staff of the Quit Rent Office. In order to complete a certain piece of work two clerks, who are not civil servants, have for a time been employed by the week at a weekly wage. Their engagement was made expressly determinable on a week's notice, and, as the work for which they were taken in is approaching completion, the services of one of the two clerks are no longer required. The services of the other will be similarly dispensed with in a short time. The Quit Rent Office being a branch of the Office of Woods, the staff of the two offices is treated as one, and transfers from the one office to the other are made when necessary. No steps need be taken to make the Quit Rent Office open to Irishmen and to Catholics. The door is at present as open to them as to other subjects of Her Majesty. Nothing is asked as to the religion of any of the clerks, nor would such an inquiry be proper.

MR. O'DRISCOLL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the work of the Quit Rent Office has its origin in the Land Settlement Survey of Ireland; that it is totally distinct from the Office of Woods and Forests; that three senior and three junior officers in the Department are Protestants; that the one gentleman now discharged is a Catholic, and that his service extends over a period of four years, while the service of the other officers have lasted only a year or less? Is the right hon. Gentleman also aware that the gentleman discharged is a fully qualified solicitor?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is a very long question to ask without notice.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I will do my best to answer it. I am sorry a question has been raised as to a difference being made between Catholics and Protestants. I assure the hon. Member that the Office do not know the religious opinions of any person engaged in the Department, and, as the officers are interchangeable between London and Dublin, of course it is purely accidental if there happens to be Protestants in Dublin or Catholics in London. If the hon. Gentleman thinks there is a grievance in Dublin, might not one arise out of the same set of circumstances in London? The engagement of the gentleman referred to was a weekly one, in view of the fact that it was only a temporary appointment, and he is now discharged because his services are no longer required.

*MR. O'DRISCOLL: Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that the original form in which I put my questions upon the Paper is that in which I have now asked them as supplementary questions, and it is not my fault that the hon. Gentleman has not had ample notice. I will further ask, is it not a fact that this gentleman's services were dispensed with by direction of the chief clerk in London, and that his immediate superior officer in Dublin has written to him explaining that the matter did not rest with him? Can the right hon. Gentleman hold out any hope that this purely Irish Office shall be managed from Dublin, and not from London?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I cannot hold out any hope of that.

STATIONERY FOR THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

MR. WICKHAM (Hants, Petersfield) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether a large proportion of the paper tendered for by firms in the United Kingdom, and accepted by Her Majesty's Stationery Office, is made on the Continent and imported into this country ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : As I have previously explained, it is not possible to state with accuracy how much of the paper bought by the Stationery Office is made abroad, though I do not think it can be called a large proportion. It is, however, well known that many English firms import paper made abroad, and no doubt a certain quantity bought by the Stationery Office is so made.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) : Would it not be possible to put in the contracts that no foreign-made paper should be supplied ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : Certainly not, without the authority of the House of Commons.

MR. TOMLINSON : Would the Government give their support to such a Resolution ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : Certainly not.

CAVALRY HORSES.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the number of horses reckoned as part of the effective strength of a cavalry regiment on a peace footing includes any horses of an age which would preclude their being used for active service ; if so, can he state what is the proportion of such horses in the cavalry regiments forming part of the First Army Corps ; and whether any Regulation exists as to the age when cavalry horses may or may not be sent on active service ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.) : There is no positive Regulation as to the maximum age of cavalry horses ; but the intention is not to send on active service any horses over 15 years of age. A certain number of horses on the establishment are over this age ; but in the case of the six regiments on the higher establishment all over 15 years are cast each year. The number in the six regiments to be so cast this year is 48, or about 2 per cent. of their establishment.

MR. BROOKFIELD : Can the right hon. Gentleman make any statement as to maximum age ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I have no information as to maximum age.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in every Army in the world there is a Regulation as to maximum age ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Very likely ; but I have said that in our Army there is no positive Regulation as to the maximum age.

IRISH TRINITY BOARD.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Government have accepted a tender from an Appledore firm who pay lower than Trades Union wages, in connection with the repairs of two lightships of the Irish Trinity Board ; whether a tender from the Passage Docks would have been successful if the terms of the Fair Wages Resolution was adhered to in Government contracts ; and whether inquiries are made respecting the rate of wages paid by competing firms previous to the contracts being given ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.) : The Board of Trade have not yet sanctioned the acceptance of any tender for the repairs of two lightships belonging to the Commissioners of Irish Lights. The tender to which the question refers was made to and accepted by those Commissioners who are not a Government Department.

METROPOLITAN CAB DISPUTES.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a case tried before Mr. Hannay, at Marlborough Street, on Friday, 29th June, where a cabman was fined £5 for having used intimidation in the effort to sell tickets, the plaintiff being one Bobby ; (2) whether it is true that this is the third case in which Bobby has secured a conviction for similar offences and received a reward of £10 from the Masters' Association; (3) and whether, seeing that the strike is now at an end, he can, by reducing the penalty or by any other means, do something to check this proceeding on the part of Bobby?

MR. ASQUITH: (1) Yes. (2) There were two cases tried at Marlborough Street Police Court, according to Mr. Hannay, in which Bobby was prosecutor. (3) Mr. Hannay is unaware whether or not Bobby received a reward of £10 from the Masters' Association. Nothing of the kind was suggested at the hearing of either of the cases, and I cannot say whether or not it is the fact. Having read the evidence given in the two cases, I see no sufficient ground for interfering with the Magistrate's decision.

GALWAY AND CLIFDEN RAILWAY.

MR. FOLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in the agreement between the Government and the Midland Great Western Railway Company for the construction of the Galway and Clifden Railway, the date, as in ordinary agreements, was given for its completion, and how far has that date been exceeded; whether any guarantee was given by the Company for its completion on such date, and if any penalty can be inflicted for any breach of the agreement entered into between the Company and the Government; and whether the number of men now employed on the Clifden section can be given, and if the Government will now at least compel the Company to employ a sufficient number of men to prevent further delay in the construction of the line?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The agreement provides that the line shall be completed within the time limited by the Orders in Council. That time—namely, December, 1894—has not been exceeded. There is no penalty specified in the agreement for delay, but the Company are bound to complete the work within the time stated, unless extended by Order in Council. Twelve hundred and forty-five men are at present engaged on the works, and there is no reason for interference.

CLERKS AT WOOLWICH.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office what has been the result of the inquiry into the status and remuneration of writers and storehouse clerks employed at Woolwich?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hanley): The rates of pay of storehouse clerks have been increased by 3s. a week. The minimum rate of writers' wages has been raised from 21s. to 23s. a week.

BILGE KEELS FOR BRITISH SHIPS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, on a recent passage from Stornoway to Greenock, with a calm sea and heavy swell, H.M.S. Empress of India rolled as much as 28 degrees, and H.M.S. Royal Sovereign as much as 33 degrees, while H.M.S. Repulse, all three being in company, only rolled 11 degrees, and whether the Repulse is the only one of the three fitted with bilge keels; and whether it is the intention of the Admiralty to fit bilge keels to the Empress of India and the Royal Sovereign, and to other ships of the same class that may be built in future; and, if so, to what extent this would create any difficulty in the use of existing docks by vessels so fitted?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): After the experience gained some months ago of the rolling of the Royal Sovereign and other ships of her type, the Admiralty decided to fit the Repulse with bilge keels. The recent rolling of the Empress of India and the Royal Sovereign has been really what the hon. Member states, while the Repulse rolled only 11 degrees or so. Arrangements were made a few days ago to fit bilge keels, as in the Repulse, to other ships of the Royal Sovereign class. The existing docks can be used by the vessels thus fitted with bilge keels.

THE ALBION COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the manuscript of the Report of Mr. Henry Hall, one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Mines, dated 20th August, 1893, on Explosions from Coal Dust in Mines, or a copy thereof, was sent to or received by the Home Office, or came to the knowledge of the Home Office before being sent to the printers; whether he is aware that the print of the Report was circulated to Members, and was available to the public until the 12th of February last; why such printed Report was not received by or came to the knowledge of the Home Office until the 26th of May last; whether, when the Report came to the knowledge of the Home Office, any special or indeed any instructions were given to the Inspector of Mines for Glamorganshire, calling the attention of the Inspector to the fact that Mr. Hall reported that, of all the dusts tested, that from the Albion Colliery, Glamorgan (the colliery in which so many men lost their lives a fortnight since), excelled all others in violence and sensitiveness to explosion, and this seam has the worst history of any in the Kingdom, upwards of 1,600 persons having been killed in it by explosions since 1845, and whether, following such Report, any steps were taken by the Home Office or any of the Inspectors with a view of minimising the danger in this particular colliery; and whether such colliery will be allowed to resume work without considering Mr. Hall's Report?

MR. ASQUITH: I have made careful inquiry into this matter. My information is not quite complete, and I shall be glad, therefore, if the hon. Member will postpone the question till Thursday.

IRISH COUNTY COURTS.

MR. KENNY (Dublin, College Green): On behalf of the hon. Member for the St. Patrick's Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council have yet arranged to hold the County Courts in Ireland more frequently; and whether any further delay will be avoided in giving such commercial facilities in this respect as those existing in Great Britain?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Committee of the Privy Council have recommended additional sittings of County Courts in several places, and an Order in Council is being prepared to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee. I may add that the changes cannot be given effect to until October next, as the sittings of these Courts are annually fixed in that month.

LONDON SMALL ARMS COMPANY, BOW.

MR. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has considered the claims of the London Small Arms Company, Bow, to a share of the Government work for this year; and, if so, with what result?

MR. WOODALL (who replied) said: A contract was made early in 1892 under which this Company is working for the Government during the present year; and a further communication has been made to them as to supplies required in 1895-96.

THE BRENNAN TORPEDO.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if any experiments have been made in the last two years in running the Brennan torpedo from steamers; if so, is the Report on this plan favourable; and if orders have been given, or are to be given, for any steamers suitable for running the Brennan torpedo?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Experiments have been made of the nature indicated with a fair promise of success, but I cannot properly give any detailed information.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

DR. KENNY: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works when the next catalogue of the National Gallery is being published, will he direct that the price paid for each picture which has been acquired by purchase should be inserted in the catalogue under the title of the picture?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT (who replied) said: I am informed that it has hitherto been considered sufficient that the prices paid for the pictures should be published in the Director's Annual Report presented to Parliament. The prices being thus accessible to the public, it is not considered that the catalogue, which is compiled for the purpose of giving information of an educational kind, is the proper place for their insertion.

DR. KENNY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in the Return to which he refers the price is not given?

Mr. Pritchard-Morgan

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I understand that the prices are stated in the Annual Report referred to.

DR. KENNY : Is it not a matter of public interest to know the price paid by the nation for pictures?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT : It might be misleading in a catalogue.

DR. KENNY : But surely it would be some guide to the people as to the value of the pictures.

MR. H. L. W. LAWSON (Gloucester, Cirencester) : Is the price given for pictures indicated in the catalogue of any National Gallery?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I think not.

DR. KENNY : Is want of a precedent any reason for not doing it?

[No answer was given.]

DUBLIN NATIONAL GALLERY.

DR. KENNY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, if the small annual grant to the National Gallery, Dublin, be not entirely expended within the financial year for which it is granted, any balance on hand must be returned to the Treasury ; and whether, as this custom is likely to prevent the acquisition by said Gallery of works of a more valuable character, by preventing the accumulation of funds efficient for their purchase, he will endeavour to induce the Treasury to permit the accumulation of unexpended balances in the hands of trustees, so as to enable them to make such purchases as they think most desirable?

MR. J. MORLEY : The Vote for the National Gallery of Ireland, which I may point out is not a grant in aid, is not accounted for by any department of the Irish Government, and the Irish Government has had no correspondence concerning it. I am afraid any endeavours of mine in the direction suggested by the hon. Gentleman would be of no avail whatever, in view of the inflexible rule which requires that unexpended balances, which are not grants in aid, must be surrendered if not expended within the financial year. The Comptroller and Auditor General would not allow any other course.

DR. KENNY pointed out that, as the grant was small, unless accumulation from year to year was allowed, there was no chance of obtaining superior works of art. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would carefully consider the point.

DUBLIN, WICKLOW, AND WEXFORD RAILWAY.

DR. KENNY : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that a feeling of uneasiness exists among those using the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway between Shanganagh and Bray that said portion of that line is dangerous owing to the abrading of the sea cliffs along which the line runs ; and whether he will direct an inquiry into the matter with a view to causing the line to be diverted from its present position at this place as it already has been diverted at Greystones, County Wicklow, for precisely similar causes?

MR. BRYCE : The Board of Trade are not aware that a feeling of uneasiness exists among those who use the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway between Shanganagh and Bray. The Board have no power to compel the Company to divert their line ; but if representations disclosing a dangerous state of things are made to the Board, I will at once direct an Inspecting Officer to visit the locality and report.

In reply to a further question,

MR. BRYCE suggested that if written representations on the subject were made to him the matter would be immediately inquired into.

KILLINEY BAY—REMOVAL OF SAND FROM FORESHORE.

DR. KENNY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can explain under what circumstances did the Law Officers of the Crown in Ireland consent to the acquirement by the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Company of the rights of the Crown over the foreshores of Killiney Bay, County Dublin, between high and low water marks ; and whether he is aware that the acquirement of said rights by this Company has been destructive of the rights enjoyed for generations by the inhabitants of the neighbourhood to take sand and gravel from the foreshore, a right admittedly without detriment to the general public good, and has caused much suffering and hardship to many industrious persons who earned a livelihood through the exercise of the right?
